SHANKER FAVORS END TO CONTRACT TALKS DURING FISCAL CRISIS

In Their Place, Teachers' Union Head Suggests a Panel Be Established 'to Take Care of Inequities'

By LEE DEMBART

In a radical departure from normal labor policy, Albert Shanker, the president of the United Federation of Teachers, says he believes that collective bargaining for new contracts should be suspended for municipal employees for the duration of New York City's fiscal crisis.

"When there's nothing to be bargained for, it's a form of torture to send people in to bargain," said Mr. Shanker, who has spent 14 months trying to negotiate a contract that presumably was settled after his union struck the city's schools in September 1975.

"It's preferable to recognize reality than to make believe it doesn't exist," Mr. Shanker said. "Maintaining bargaining-as-usual posture in a period of a combination of war and bankruptcy is ridiculous."

Alternative Suggested

In place of collective bargaining, Mr. Shanker suggested that a structure like the War Labor Board of World War II be set up "to take care of inequities." The implication was that if no inequity was found, public employees would not get raises.

Mr. Shanker acknowledged that his suggestion was an unusual one for a labor leader to make, in the light of unions' belief that collective bargaining is the best process for resolving labor-management conflicts.

Throughout the fiscal crisis, Victor Gotbaum, the executive director of District Council 37 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, which represents more than 100,000 city workers, has insisted that whatever else the city might want to take away from its employees, collective bargaining had to remain.

Gotbaum Doesn't Agree

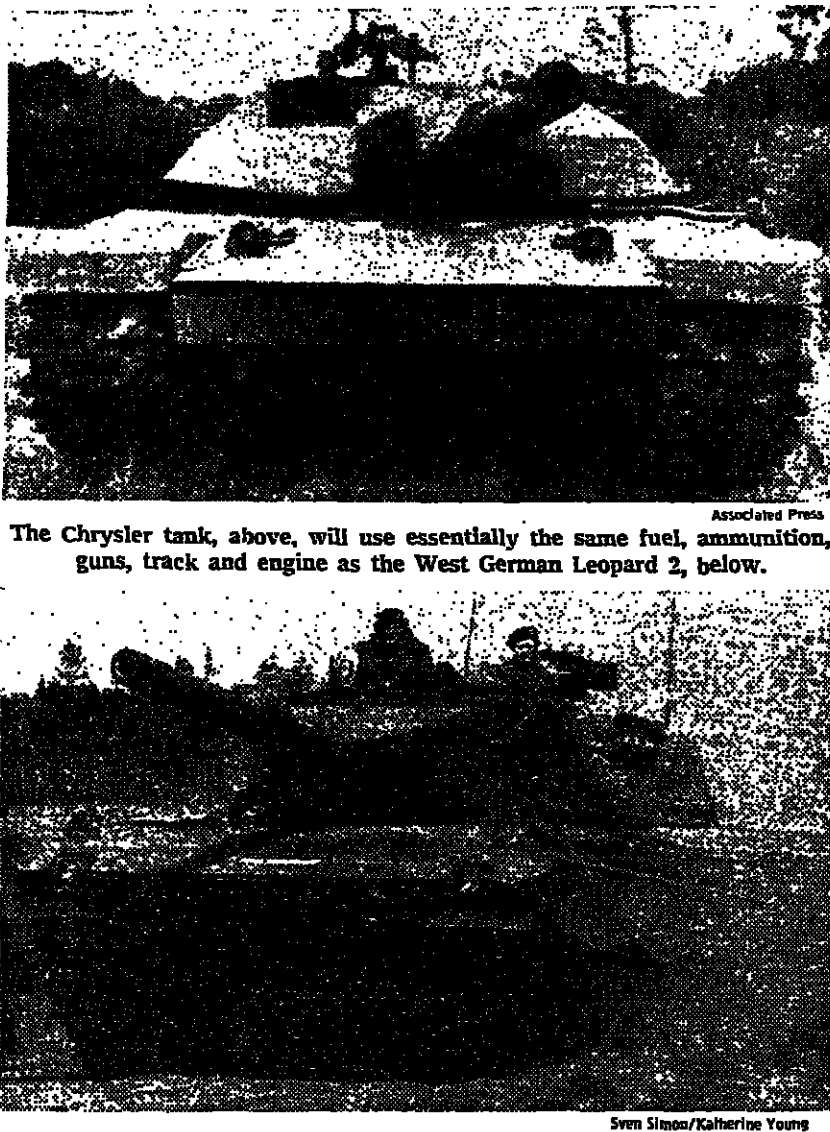

"I couldn't disagree with him more," Mr. Gotbaum said yesterday. "You don't just bargain for wages, you bargain for dignity. We would not give up collective bargaining. We would regard that as a worse mistake than a diminishment of wages."

Jack Bigel, the labor consultant who is an adviser to Mr. Gotbaum as well as to John DeLuca, the president of the United Sanitationmen's Association, said, "There are 101 items to bargain for, including productivity gains."

Through a spokesman, a noncommittal Mayor Beame said, "It's an interesting concept from an interesting man."

First Deputy Mayor John E. Zuccotti, who has shouldered the major bargaining responsibilities for the city, said: "There's a certain reality to what he says, but maybe it should be put as an alternative. Maybe there should be a

ARMY PICKS CHRYSLER TO DEVELOP NEW TANK AT $4.9 BILLION COST

COMPANY IS CHOSEN OVER G.M.

Vehicle, Planned to Meet U.S. Needs to End of Century, Would Use Same Parts as German Tank

By JOHN W. FINNIZY

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12—The Army selected the Chrysler Corporation today to develop and build its new main battle tank in a weapons program that is expected to cost $4.9 billion over the next decade.

Chrysler was chosen over the General Motors Corporation after a two-year competition between the two automobile manufacturers to develop a tank that would meet the Army's battlefield needs through the rest of this century.

The selection of Chrysler reverses an Army recommendation of last July that the General Motors version be adopted. That recommendation was rejected by the Defense Department, which ordered the Army to reopen the competition between the two companies so that they could modify their proposals to incorporate standard components with West German tanks.

In the opinion of West German representatives, the outcome of the extension was a major step toward standardization of tank equipment among members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The new tank, known as the Abrams in honor of the late Gen. Creighton W. Abrams, the former Army Chief of Staff who was regarded as a brilliant tank commander in World War II, will be powered by a gas turbine engine, which West Germany has agreed to use in its new Leopard 2 tank.

Single Tank Considered

At one time, consideration was given to having the two allies adopt the same tank. The Leopard 2 tank is still being evaluated by the Army at its proving grounds in Aberdeen, Md., but it is now generally accepted on both sides that, largely for nationalistic reasons, it is impossible to standardize on the same tank. Thus, each nation will build its own tank, incorporating as many standard components as possible.

The turbine engine will be built by the Lycoming Division of the Avco Corporation, which has estimated that the tank contract will pump $60 million a year into the Connecticut economy and result in 1,800 additional jobs at its plant in Stratford, Conn.

The new tank will also have a turret capable of handling either a 105-millimeter gun, such as the kind the Army is using in its current generation of M-60 tanks, or a 120-millimeter gun, which West Germany and Britain are developing for their next generation of tanks.

The American and German tanks will also use the same track system. Therefore, the American and West German tanks will use essentially the same tank items that are logistically important on the battlefield, such as fuel, ammunition,

Vote by U.S. Against Israel at U.N. Linked to Effort for Mideast Talks

By PETER GROSE

Special to The New York Times

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., Nov. 12—The decision of the United States to join in the Security Council's criticism of Israel yesterday was part of what might be the final effort by Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger to enhance American influence among the moderate Arabs, in expectation of possible Middle East peace talks early in the Carter Administration.

This is the explanation that knowledgeable American diplomats gave today for Washington's decision to join in the unanimous Security Council criticism of certain Israeli policies in the occupied Arab territories.

The move marked a shift in diplomatic tactics by the United States, without changing the substance of its policy. Though resisting previous Security Council condemnations, the United States has never recognized Israel's annexation of Arab east Jerusalem and has repeatedly criticized the establishment of Israeli settlements in the lands taken in the 1967 war.

[In Israel, Foreign Minister Yigal Allon called in the United States Ambassador to express displeasure over the United States vote and to accuse it of "discrimination." Page 6.]

Israeli and Arab diplomats were consulted regularly by American representatives throughout the days of private consultations that led up to a compromise statement by the Security Council.

Israeli diplomats, led by the chief representative, Chaim Herzog, have outspokenly criticized the Council's action in public statements. Privately, they admit that the majority of the Council would have voted a far stronger condemnation if the United States had not used the leverage of providing unanimity in order to tone down the earlier anti-Israeli drafts.

The discussions between the United States and the Arab and Israeli diplomats led both Mr. Kissinger and the American representative at the United Nations, William W. Scranton, to conclude that the United States had an opportunity to support moderate trends among the Arabs, without at the same time weakening the fundamental Israeli-American relationship.

Even as they moved to reassure anxious Israelis that no real change in United States policy had occurred, American diplomats said that the decision was specifically designed to give a show of encouragement to Egypt, Syria and Saudi Arabia. These governments recently concluded agreements in the Saudi capital of

DES FORESEE $1.1 TRILLION BUDGET

Expected in 1978 Fiscal Year Without New Outlays

By LEEN SHANAHAN

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12—The Ford Administration's first preliminary look at the 1978 fiscal year, Government spending will exceed $450 billion, even if administration proposes no increase in outlays, new programs or phasing out, would amount to about $1.1 trillion, according to the estimates of Management and Budget. The figures were contained in a memorandum, required by law to be sent to Congress at this time, which says the budget is in the existing programs.

It also specifies the amount to be spent in the current year, which began Oct. 1. Management and Budget is projecting for the current, 1977 fiscal year a range between $412 billion and $422 billion, under existing spending arrangements. The budget deficit for the year is projected at $10 billion. Page 38, Column 1

Tentative Accord Reported in Strike At United Parcel

By DAMON STETSON

The United Parcel Service and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters have reached agreement on basic terms for ending an eight-week strike of warehousemen and deliverymen in 15 Eastern states, informed sources said yesterday.

There was no formal announcement of a settlement, pending completion of specific contract language over the weekend and discussion of the proposed terms with local union leaders.

United Parcel will resume operations almost immediately once union members give their approval to the pact, a company spokesman said, but this was not expected until the middle of next week.

The strike, which began Sept. 15, did not directly affect New York City, Westchester and Long Island, where a contract covering U.P.S. workers does not expire until next June 30. But post offices here, as in the states directly affected, have been swamped with packages normally shipped by United Parcel.

Shoppers in New York from New Jersey and Connecticut have been carrying packages home rather than risk the uncertainties of delayed delivery by the overloaded Postal Service and trucking companies. Some New Jersey retailers reported having to wait two weeks or longer for delivery of small packages from New York

Uproar Over U.S. Judge Told It to Revise Government

By WAYNE KING

Special to The New York Times

MOBILE, Ala., Nov. 11—A Federal judge ordering Mobile to scrap its government and replace it with a more favorable to blacks has storm of protest in this city, petition drive to impeach the judge, said Mayor Mims in an interview, "that Government has told a free kind of government they can do that, they can tell you to go to bed, what time to get up, what to eat, what to wear."

He ordered that in the municipal election next year the commission was to be replaced by a mayor elected by citywide vote and nine council members elected from single-member districts.

Given the city's racially polarized voting pattern, this would likely result in the election of at least three and possibly four blacks.

The court found that the vote of Mobile's blacks, 35 percent of the population, was "diluted" by the white majority, making it unlikely to elect a black in a citywide vote.

The ruling is believed to be one of the most extensive intrusions by the courts so far into legislative and executive affairs. The Mobile City Commission was established under legislative power of the State of Alabama in 1911 and has twice been retained by popular vote of the city's voters.

In Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, the courts have ordered similar changes. Page 48, Column 1

Atrocities by Angolan Forces Described by Refugees

By JOHN F. BURNS

Special to The New York Times

OMUNGWELUME, South-West Africa, Nov. 12—The civil war in Angola sputters on, and here in the semidesert nine miles south of the Angolan border, fugitives from the killing huddle together pathetically beneath a blazing sun, dependent on white South Africans, who administer this territory, for their survival.

Piecing together accounts by the refugees, and by South African officials here, a picture emerges of an offensive by the Angolan Government along a broad front, running from a point north of here to more than 100 miles farther west.

The objective appears to have been to wipe out resistance by the forces of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, which draws its main strength from villagers in the region.

At noon today, there were 2,857 people, mostly women and children, gathered in a sandy compound at this tribal station, and additional truckloads were on the way. They were part of a refugee exodus of more than 9,000 that has crossed the frontier into South-West Africa since the latest round in the fighting flared two weeks ago.

Today, the South African Defense Force flew a group of 40 reporters on a 2,250-mile round trip from Pretoria to a military base near the tribal station, to authenticate reports of atrocities against the villagers of southern Angola. South Africa was itself deeply involved in the civil war until March, when it withdrew its troops.

In interviews, the refugees said that they had fled on foot across the border when Angolan Government forces—supported by Cuban soldiers and guerrillas belonging to the South-West African People's Organization, a black liberation movement—attacked their villages. They said that many of their menfolk had been killed, their huts burned, and their cattle

U.S., Vietnam Open First Formal Talks Since Fall of Saigon

By FLORA LEWIS

Special to The New York Times

PARIS, Nov. 12—American and Vietnamese diplomats met here today to begin their first formal talks since the fall of Saigon last year.

Although the goal of the meetings has been said to be the establishment of diplomatic relations, the contacts during today's two-hour session were considered preliminary ones, testing whether conditions were favorable for full-scale negotiations on all issues between the United States and Vietnam.

The prime issue for the United States—the fate of some 800 American servicemen still officially listed as missing in action in the Vietnam war—was raised by the American delegation, headed by Samuel Rhee Gammou, the deputy chief of mission at the United States Embassy here. The United States has long stressed that Vietnam must account for the missing Americans before other problems can be settled.

[In Washington, the State Department said no progress was made in the initial session to warrant any change in the United States intention to veto Vietnam's application for United Nations membership. A spokesman reported that the two delegations had said they would study each other's statements but that they did not set a date for the next meeting.]

The Vietnamese delegation was headed by Tan Hoan, who like the

A New Shuttle for Kissinger, To Publishers With Memoirs

By HERBERT MITGANG

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger is about to embark on one of his most challenging diplomatic journeys—the selling of his memoirs. How skillfully he maneuvers for the rights to his life story could mean the difference between merely a large advance and the biggest advance in book publishing history.

The figures being touted up in at least a half-dozen publishing houses in the United States and Europe seeking all worldwide rights range from $1 million to $3 million.

"If Lyndon Johnson got $1.7 million for his memoirs and Richard Nixon is getting $2 million for his," said a New York publisher, "then Henry Kissinger has to be a State Department source who knows Mr. Kissinger's thoughts about his memoirs says that next month before he leaves office, he will examine the closely guarded file of book proposals now in the 57th-floor office of his attorney, Carlyle Elwood Maw, at Cravath, Swaine & Moore, 1 Chase Manhattan Plaza, New York.

Lawyer Is Central Figure

Mr. Maw, a cautious 73-year-old lawyer, is the central figure in the pre-negotiation stage for the memoirs. He was brought to Washington by Mr. Kissinger in 1973, first as legal adviser in the State Department and then Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance. He resigned in September.

"I think Dr. Kissinger will write a book," Mr. Maw said. "Maybe several of them. But he has not made notes and hasn't started writing. He's been a pretty busy man."

"There will be no discussions until after Dr. Kissinger departs. I represented him on one of his books before he went to Washington, but he negotiated his own contracts in the past."

Cravath, Swaine & Moore is counsel in New York for CBS Inc., which owns Holt, Rinehart & Winston, one of the main bidders for the memoirs. The firm also does legal work for Time Inc., which owns Little, Brown & Company, another bidder. This fact is considered noteworthy in the effort to obtain the memoirs.

Attorney in Negotiations

Mr. Kissinger has never used a literary agent and, according to a well-known knowledgeable source at the State Department, probably will not employ one. His present intention, the source said, is to use his attorney in the negotiations.

"He seemed to know all there is to know about book negotiations," said George E. Brockway, president of W. W. Norton in New York, which published his "American Foreign Policy." "At the time we were in competition with other publishers, and Dr. Kissinger made a good deal."

Norton is the only publisher holding a contract with Mr. Kissinger—for a basic textbook on international relations—but it is uncertain if he will ever deliver it. "Our contract is not for the big memoirs book," Mr. Brockway said, "but we assume that we will be in on the bidding. We are big enough to make a big offer."

Richard E. Snyder, president of Simon & Schuster, a subsidiary of Gulf and Western Industries said: "The financial terms would be considerable, but in this case it would be for value received."

Thomas C. Wallace, editor-in-chief of Holt, Rinehart & Winston, the CBS subsidiary said: "We've made an offer that may be as large or larger than anyone's and we did so in writing for Mr. Maw last summer. Our offer is conditional on meeting with Dr. Kissinger and discussing the contents of the book."

Another New York publisher reported that Mr. Maw was doing more than merely collecting offers. He said Mr. Maw had asked, "What are all the worldwide printing rights to the Kissinger memoirs worth?"

"Whatever the highest bidder pays," the publisher replied.

Simon Michael Bessie, senior vice president of Harper & Row, said: "We are doing our very best to be the publishers but we do not harbor the illusion that we are alone. We published his 'Unclear Weapons and Foreign Policy,' and we are in discussion with Mr. Maw. One would like to see a full-fledged autobiography of his life and career, with the Nixon-Ford tenure as the climax. Ideally, it would be one big, magnificent volume."

Additional Interests Weighed

Arthur H. Thornhill Jr., chairman of the board and president of Little, Brown & Company, the Time subsidiary, said: "We have made no formal proposal but will probably do just that soon. We want to determine the size of the offer by weighing international and ancillary interests. We paid Norman Mailer a million dollars, but that was for a whole publishing program."

Samuel S. Vaughan, president of Doubleday, said: "If a Kissinger book could make some historical news it would be worth more than a million dollars. We are willing to offer a consequential figure."

Among those who have talked with Mr. Kissinger about his memoirs is Sydney Gruson, an executive vice president of The New York Times Company, which owns Quadrangle, a book publishing house. Like several other hardcover companies, Quadrangle has considered the prospects on a cooperative basis with paperback houses. In addition, the possibility has been held out of Mr. Kissinger's writing a column for Special Features, The New York Times syndicate.

Mr. Kissinger has reportedly told friends he might be interested in a combination of writing his memoirs, doing a newspaper or magazine column, and serving as a foreign-affairs expert for a television network. None of the three networks in New York, according to spokesmen, have approached Mr. Kissinger about broadcasts of his memoirs.

Shelf Life of a Year

An authority in news-service syndication, speculating on the value of Mr. Kissinger as a columnist, remarked: "Former public officials who write columns have a shelf life of about a year. Most of them run out of material. And, don't forget, unlike some of the felons who have been convicted and made a name for themselves, Kissinger has no Watergate behind him to make himself a controversial sell."

Internationally, a number of American publishers have discussed with their British and Continental counterparts the possibility of co-publishing or foreign rights to the memoirs.

Remote Capital of Saudi Arabia Now Busy Cosmopolitan Center

By ERIC PACE

Special to The New York Times
RIYADH, Saudi Arabia—In a fragrant barber shop Saudi sheikhs have their mustaches trimmed by a Palestinian. At the Riyadh airport a flock of Japanese businessmen is shepherded by a Sudanese. In the hotels the restaurant buffet tables are thronged with Americans, Britons, Frenchmen and Italians—and the waiters are mostly Egyptian. This solemn and secretive capital, set in the remote heart of the Arabian Peninsula, is getting to be downright cosmopolitan thanks to the Government's oil revenues of $30 billion a year, give or take a few million.

An Italian salesman, the first of Americans to be seen in the city, said that money is to be spent here in Riyadh, which was the stronghold of the ruling family even before the modern Saudi state was formed—and before the oil money started rolling in.

Over the years the Government has grown increasingly tolerant of strangers, so foreign businessmen have been trooping through, trying to get in on the action, and workers from less affluent nations have come to seek their livelihoods along the capital's dusty boulevards.

The results include a babble of tongues and accents and a variety of tastes in beverages, not all of which can be legally fulfilled in this austere society, and a roller coaster of prices.

Up-to-date statistics are sparse. The Government is not sure how much money it has spent since summer. Recent estimates are that in addition to four million to five million Saudis there are perhaps 1.5 million non-Saudis, mostly Yemenis, scattered across the country, which is almost the size of Texas and Alaska combined.

Among the foreigners are more than 20,000 Americans, many of whom have arrived since the current oil boom began late in 1973. The influx of Americans and other high-spending foreigners has helped to drive prices up by over 20 percent a year by some estimates, although the Government says it has been braking inflation lately.

"The heat is dying down now, although it's true the economy is still pretty warm," Mansour al-Turki, Deputy Finance Minister, told a visitor.

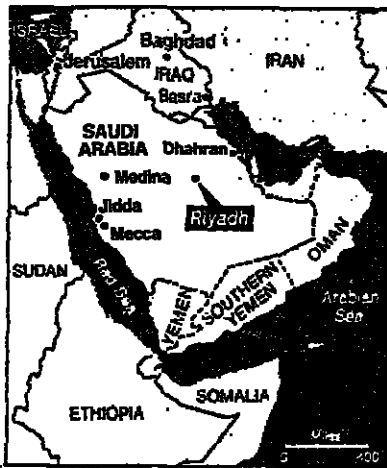

As part of the effort to restrain prices the Government has been pressing contractors to provide their own housing for their imported employees. Nonetheless, scores of foreign technicians are roosting in the capital's hotels, which have long since been badly crowded.

Those foreigners, who arrive without ironclad reservations are often reduced to crisscrossing the city by taxi, pleading with hotel receptionists to let them in. A stiffer upper lip was displayed by Faisal al-Bashir, Assistant Deputy Planning Minister, who speaking with a European interviewer. "To develop a country," he observed, "one must make sacrifices in comfort, if not financial sacrifices."

Riyadh's weather is dry and often very hot, which makes people thirsty. The Government is going to great lengths to quench thirsts with ordinary water; obtaining tastier fluids is sometimes problematical.

With the Riyadh population rapidly expanding—it is estimated at 750,000—the Government is planning to augment the supply of well water with an elaborate system of pipelines and wells, tapping additional underground water supplies and desalting as necessary.

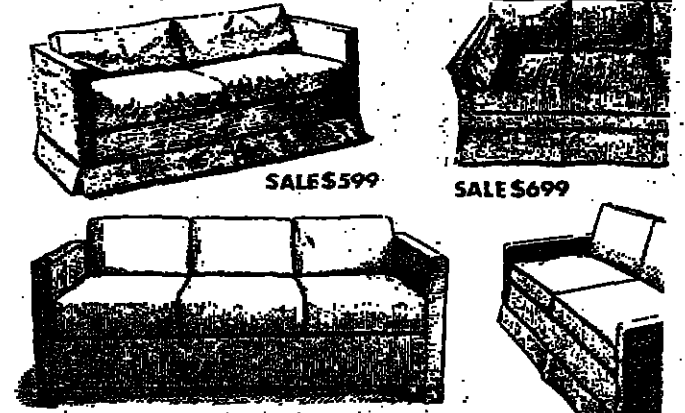

Some foreigners have preferred bottled water that used to come from Lebanon but that seems to be a casualty of the civil war there. Now they are being served a variety of relatively stable Syria.

Since alcohol is officially forbidden in Saudi Arabia, where the state religion is a puritanical brand of Islam, foreigners are also visible at hotels and restaurants sipping wistfully at imported nonalcoholic apple juice and a nonalcoholic beverage resembling beer.

A traveler is told that hard liquor is surreptitiously purveyed despite efforts to enforce prohibition. A British businessman reported that a Jordanian truck driver smuggling Scotch whisky overland could earn enough in a few trips to retire—if he was not caught by Saudi patrols.

Seen Continuing Coldness White Moscow's Hints at Thaw

By FOX BUTTERFIELD
Special to The New York Times

Nov. 12—Two months of Mao Tse-tung, analysts believe has continued its unrelenting policy of hostility to the Soviet Union despite the fact that it would welcome any officials who have reportedly been in Peking over the weeks that there will be a change in the Chinese leadership. The Soviet Union's successor as Chairman of the Communist Party.

The press has continued its polemics against what it sees as the official press agency, and five dispatches on Russia, including one discussing Moscow's "setting" of Western Europe.

They do not exclude entirely the possibility that the Chinese leadership may be gradually moving toward a more open relationship with the West. It is far too early to judge from Mr. Hua, which is open to charges of na-see even less chance of a change in the early 1960's and deep-seated ideological differences. Mao died and then again was appointed his successor. The Party believed that the Soviet Union is attempting to encourage better relations with China, but so far without demonstrable success.

U.S. Assesses Soviet Moves

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12—State Department officials believe that the Soviet Union is attempting to encourage better relations with China, but so far without demonstrable success.

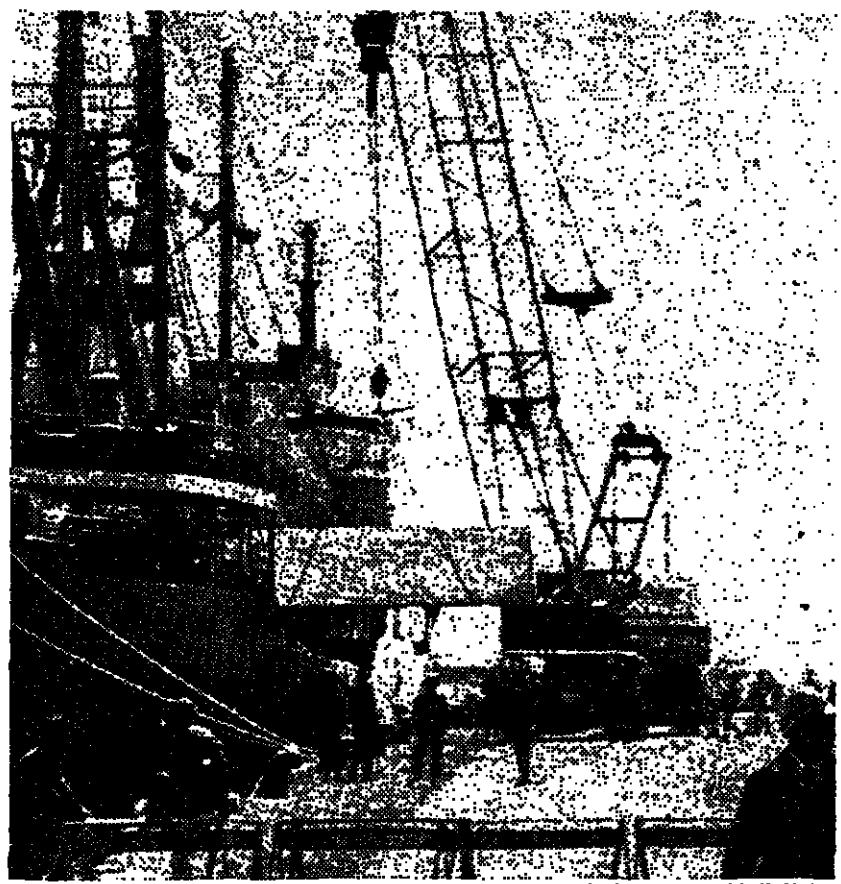

They feel that Moscow does not want to allow the period of uncertainty following Mao's death to slip by without making a renewed effort to lessen hostility with Peking. They also believe that Moscow has also been trying to put its relations with Peking in a better light than the real situation may warrant.

China experts in the Ford Administration think that the passing of Mao, with his entrenched hostility toward Moscow, opened the possibility of a thaw. But so far, they believe the signals from Peking have been mixed to negative, including this week's public labeling of the Soviet Communist Party leader, Leonid I. Brezhnev, as a "liar."

Possible Signals to Carter
The officials and the experts here also think the new Peking leadership might see some wisdom in small gestures of friendship to Moscow, if only to signal President-elect Jimmy Carter that China is not locked into the United States and has other options.

During the foreign-policy debate with President Ford, Mr. Carter pledged to seek normal relations with Peking, but added that he would never let that effort stand in the way of the preservation of the independence and freedom of the people of Taiwan. This and similar statements had overtones of a two-China policy, anathema to Peking.

To-day the Soviet Government newspaper Izvestia stated that the Soviet Union was convinced that neighborly relations and friendship with China would be restored. The article, written to commemorate the 110th anniversary of the birth of Sun Yat-sen, declared that the revolutionary leader's "testament to the Chinese people was to guard their friendship with the Soviet people like the apple of their eye."

Japanese Return Jet to Russians In Pieces Loaded on Lumber Ship

By ANDREW H. MALCOLM
Special to The New York Times

HITACHI, Japan, Nov. 12—With a fleet of Russian vessels standing offshore and more than 2,000 armed policemen standing guard onshore, Japan today returned to the Soviet Union—in pieces—the controversial MIG-25 jet fighter that has strained diplomatic relations between the two Asian powers.

The aircraft, flown here Sept. 6 by a Soviet Air Force officer who was defecting to the United States, was returned dismantled and without ceremony on a lonely, windswept pier in this quiet port city 100 miles northeast of Tokyo.

Russian "sailors," wearing Western-style business suits, immediately began peering into the packing crates. If all goes according to schedule after a detailed inventory of the parts, the world's fastest jet fighter, which flew to Japan at supersonic speeds, will begin its homeward journey to Siberia Monday inside the Soviet lumber freighter Talgonas at about 16 miles an hour.

No Longer Top-Secret
The plane is no longer a top-secret weapon. Japanese and American experts have pored over the craft piece by piece almost from the moment that Lieut. Viktor I. Belenko landed his twin-engine jet at the Hakodate civilian airport on the northern island of Hokkaido two months ago. The pilot, still undergoing questioning by the Central Intelligence Agency, is in seclusion near Washington.

The plane was taken apart and flown to Hyakuri Air Base. It is a well-made, high-altitude interceptor whose technology is, nevertheless, inferior to that of American makes. Although a MIG-25 was once tracked at 3.2 times the speed of sound, the pilot reported that Mach 3 was its maximum—still faster than American counterparts. The MIG's "look-down" radar was also said to be of poorer quality than American versions.

The Soviet Union issued demands almost daily for the plane's immediate return. One strongly worded statement called Japan's retention of the plane an "unfriendly" act, which clouded the friendly relations between the two countries.

tries. The Russians hinted darkly that a third nation, presumably the United States, was intervening in the affair and had obstructed the pilot's wish to return home, possibly with drugs.

Relations between officials of the Moscow and Tokyo governments became chilly. The seizure of Japanese fishing boats for violating Soviet territorial waters seemed to increase. Some trade visits and economic meetings were postponed. The Soviet visas of some Japan Air Lines crew members were found to be improper.

The Soviet Union refused to exchange ceremonial congratulatory telegrams on Oct. 19, the 20th anniversary of the resumption of Russian-Japanese diplomatic relations. A Japanese volleyball team was unable to obtain Soviet travel documents.

Economic Risks Considered
But the protests appeared carefully scaled to avoid any serious or lasting disruption of relations that would do the Russians more economic harm than propaganda good. For continental trade, the Japanese can always turn to mainland China, to which they are historically and culturally drawn.

Nonetheless, in long private talks with Japanese businessmen last summer at his vacation retreat at Yalta, the Soviet Communist Party chief, Leonid I. Brezhnev, spoke of his strong desire for large-scale Japanese loans over the next 10 to 15 years to help develop the vast natural resources of Siberia.

For their part, the Japanese treated the incident as unrelated to any other Russian-Japanese issues, in hopes of minimizing its effect. They maintained that the pilot, who was seeking political asylum in the States that he has since won, committed a violation of airspace by landing at Hakodate. They have demanded, thus far unsuccessfully, compensation for damaged runway lights there.

Officials say privately that they expect the affair to blow over quietly by year's end. Negotiations over the return of the plane, which took almost a month, ended Tuesday.

At Least Half a Million Workers Across Spain Stage Job Actions

By JAMES M. MARKHAM
Special to The New York Times

MADRID, Nov. 12—At least a half-million industrial workers across Spain today staged stoppages, held political assemblies in factories or walked off the job in a one-day protest against a Government-decreed package of austerity measures.

The protest, which only left-wingers termed a general strike, was strongest in Barcelona, the industrial belt around Madrid, Seville, the Basque country and the northern mining center of Asturias.

Called by an umbrella organization of Spain's three main, illegal trade unions, the protest rallied an impressive number of industrial workers, but scarcely affected the nation's transportation system or its white-collar and agricultural workers.

The umbrella organization, which groups the Communist-dominated Workers' Commissions, the Socialist General Union of Workers and the smaller Workers' Syndical Union, appeared to have called the strike to demonstrate its growing strength and to channel discontent into one day.

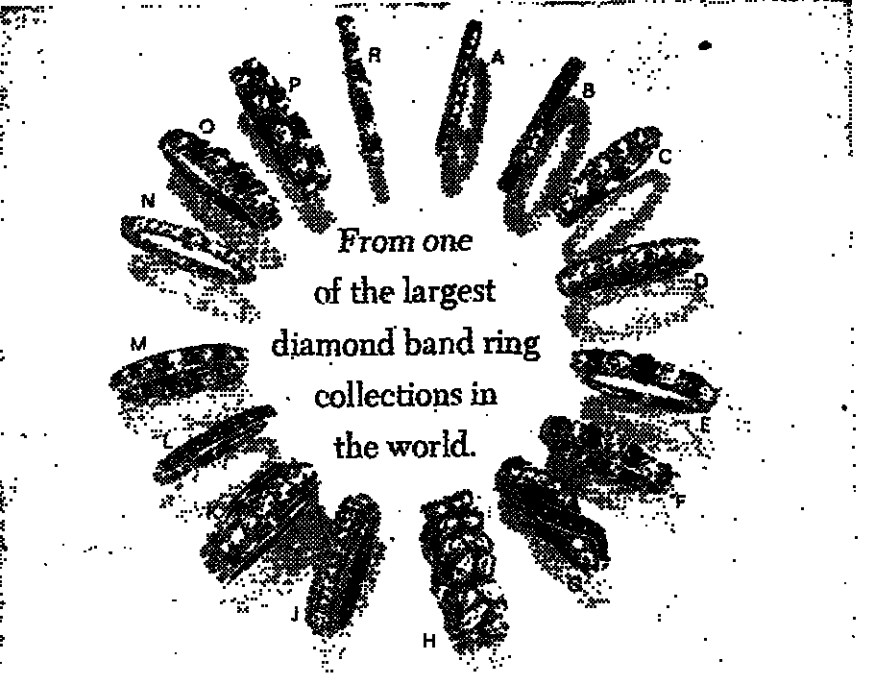

Speakers at factory assemblies attacked the Government's economic program, which limits collective bargaining and wage raises and facilitates firings, and demanded an 85¢ monthly increase for all workers and recognition of the unions.

In preparing the strike, organizers stressed that it should be "responsible and peaceful" and instructed militants at the factory level to try to negotiate the holding of assemblies with employers.

The unions' theme of responsibility seemed intended, in part, to avoid upsetting the passage of the Government's political reform bill through the right-wing dominated Parliament, which will convene on Tuesday to consider it.

Today, a parliamentary drafting committee issued its own version of the bill. It made only minor linguistic adjustments in the Government's text, thereby rejecting ultra-rightist amendments. The bill paves the way for democratic elections to a two-chamber legislature next spring.

"Today's action was the most important turnout since the civil war," said a spokesman for the Union Coordinating Committee, "and we feel that it marks a milestone in the history of the working class and the people of the Spanish state."

Refugees in South-West Africa Describe Atrocities by Angolan and crops destroyed. In one typical account, Gabriel Ndishishi, a bearded man in a battered felt hat, said that Government troops backed by Cubans attacked his village, half a day's walk from the border, two days ago.

He said they shot without warning at men and young boys, killing 20 or 30. The rest of the villagers panicked and fled, hiding their way to the border and over the three-foot security fence that leads into South-West Africa.

Mr. Ndishishi said he recognized the Cubans by their fraser skins, and their long hair. "They do nothing for Angola," he said. "They just come to kill and burn." The Angolans are pursuing forces of the National Union, one of three nationalist groups that contended for power after the country gained its independence from Portugal a year ago yesterday. Aligning itself with forces of the National Front for the Liberation of Angola, and supported by South African troops, it battled for control of the country with the troops of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola.

The Popular Movement, supported by up to 15,000 Cuban troops equipped with Soviet arms, eventually prevailed. Its supremacy was sealed by March of this year, when the South Africans, disillusioned by a Congressional vote to cut off United States aid to the pro-Western

The New York Times/Nov. 13, 1976
Refugees from Angola have poured into Oshanaungwe and other South-West African towns.

More than eight months after the Popular Movement claimed total victory, however, the civil war goes on. The National Union, retreating into the bushlands in the southern part of the country, has continued to harass Popular Movement and Cuban forces. The National Front's fortunes are less certain, but its leader, Holden Roberto, claimed recently that he still had 30,000 men under arms, operating close to the Zaire border in the north.

South African military spokesmen believe that the latest offensive was ordered in an attempt to wipe out the National Union before the first anniversary of the country's independence, or at least before the rainy season starts in about two weeks' time. When the rains come, the soft sand of the region becomes impassable for motorized vehicles, removing the Government's advantage.

No Injuries Apparent
Another theory is that the Popular Movement has decided to root out National Union support in the border area, and stop border crossings, in an attempt to halt South African aid for the guerrilla movement. Such aid, in the form of supplies of arms and training, has been rumored for months. However, there is no hard evidence to support the rumors, and military spokesmen have declined to discuss the issue.

The immediate problem for the South Africans is coping with the refugees. Today, rain clouds were gathering across the desert to the west, a warning that only a few days remain when it will be possible for most of the refugees to sleep on the sand beneath the open skies. An airlift of tents by the military is a possibility, but the South Africans seem reluctant to give the camp manancy.

About 1,000 of the refugees are gathered beneath a shelter of corrugated iron. The rest shade of the mopani trees compound, especially at 1 temperature reaches a s greens.

Rhodesia Reports Guerrilla Move

By MICHAEL T. KAUFMAN
Special to The New York Times

SALISBURY, Rhodesia, Nov. 12—A wave of 800 recently trained nationalist guerrillas are moving into Rhodesia from Mozambique in a push timed to place pressure on the Geneva talks, a Rhodesian spokesman said today.

He charged that this effort represented the third wave of incursions this year by guerrillas into the three military sectors stretching along the northern and eastern borders of Rhodesia.

At a briefing this morning, the spokesman said that each of the two previous infiltration waves had involved about 800 guerrillas—most of them 17 to 20 years old.

The spokesman said that Rhodesian forces had killed 900 guerrillas this year. In addition, he said, a number of guerrillas are believed to have deserted as a result of tribal and political factionalism. In light of this and taking account of the considerable "to-ing and fro-ing" across the border, the spokesman said, Rhodesian strategists believed that fewer than 2,000 guerrillas were inside the country.

He did not explain what effect, if any, the recent Rhodesian pre-emptive strikes on training camps in Mozambique had on the rate of infiltration. But he suggested that the raids had heightened Rhodesian morale and had denied tons of war material to the insurgents.

He said that guerrilla operations had grown increasingly bold in recent months and that the groups were equipped with more powerful weapons. Attempted guerrilla attacks on rail lines and troop movements, he said, had forced the Rhodesians to adopt certain defensive methods such as moving in convoys and guarding rail links. Such measures have caused some drain on manpower, the spokesman said.

Since the expansion of the guerrilla war began three years ago, the spokesman said, 1,400 guerrillas had been killed, 901 of them this year. In the same period, he said, 189 members of the Rhodesian security forces had been killed, 86 this year.

Geneva Session Today

GENEVA, Nov. 12—An accord on the time needed to complete arrangements for the transfer of rule to the black majority continues to elude Ivor Richard, British chairman of the conference on the future of Rhodesia. Despite the failure to bridge differences during a long series of private meetings with chief delegates since the conferences last full session a week ago, Mr. Richard called another such meeting for tomorrow morning.

British Renew Sanctions

LONDON, Nov. 12 (Reuters)—The British House of Lords today renewed the sanctions order against the breakaway colony of Rhodesia for the 11th year. Britain and other United Nations member states imposed economic and other sanctions against Rhodesia after the white minority Government seized independence from Britain on Nov. 11, 1965 to avoid majority rule.

Lords Criticized Official

Nov. 12 (Reuters)—A left-minister called today for complete abolition of the House of Lords which is trying to block Labor Government legislation. The minister, Anthony Wedgwood Benn, said the Government sent back to the House of Lords a series of bills which it has not passed but which critics have said are extreme socialist measures. Benn said the Government has been amending the bills and sending them to the House of Lords where Labor has a majority.

The Government just made its most amendments in a bill to extend dockworkers' labor cannot get its bills passed in the current session. Unfinished legislation is piled up. The Government also was growing impatient with members of Parliament for the upper chamber, which has not acted in the 13th century and is controlled by non-elected peers.

Castro a Note on Hijacking Accord

Nov. 12 (AP)—The United States and Cuba responded to a note to Cuba responding to a 3-year agreement to prevent hijackings, the State Department said today.

Fidel Castro renounced the hijacking agreement on Oct. 15 after it was sabotaged. Mr. Castro said the hijacking agreement was a military prison sentence for a 20-day sentence.

Mr. Castro was jailed for violating the hijacking agreement by making a speech in the leftist military journal, "Revolution," on Oct. 25, 1975. Mr. Carvalho, his government post and supporters rallied for a brief time against his imprisonment. A few associates were at the prison outside Lisbon freed shortly after dawn. Nov. 12 (AP)—Maj. Otelo Salgueiro, former national security director, was released from a military prison after serving a 20-day sentence. Researcher Isolated to Virus

Nov. 12—A British researcher with the mysterious "agent" fever that has caused more than 300 deaths in central Africa has been exposed to the laboratory mishap. The researcher may have been infected with a syringe infected while inoculating guinea pigs. Dr. Charles A. Cockfield, the World Health Organization's infectious diseases section, pierced the protective glove he was wearing. However, it was not clear if the researcher was actually infected. He said, adding that the fever was caused by a mild infection. The researcher at the laboratory was isolated and has been taken to treat him and to prevent its spread.

Student Killed Hurt by Police

Nov. 12—One student was shot dead and more than 100 were injured when police opened fire on demonstrators at Sri Lanka's Peradeniya campus, here. The demonstrators were said to have fired after a baton charge had failed to disperse about 2,000 demonstrators. The demonstrators were obstructing the president of the university from leaving his office. The university was closed yesterday for the president's removal. The demonstrators are seeking money from universities to return home. The state radio maintained silence. The opposition political leader led an urgent debate in Parliament on the deteriorating situation. The Peradeniya campus was one of the hotspots of an insurgency five years ago and a serious threat to the Socialist Government.

Style Legal System Proposed for India

The newspaper said that the system had proved beneficial and the Soviet Union. The National Herald, said that the complicated Indian law, derived from the British, should be eliminated. The newspaper said that the Socialist countries, each Indian law should be reduced to simple sentences. Lebanese Continue Shooting As Syrians Delay Advance

By JAMES F. CLARITY
Special to The New York Times

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 12—In what are supposed to be the final hours, or days, of the 19-month Lebanese civil war, sporadic violence and killing are continuing here within earshot of Syrian peace-keeping troops.

An estimated 6,000 Syrian soldiers and at least 200 tanks are expected to move toward the center from their positions on the edge of the city at any time. The Syrians have been so close to the center for the last two days that people wake up each morning hoping that they will come, regardless of whether the Syrians are viewed as true "peacekeepers," as designated by recent agreement of the major Arab nations, or as a foreign occupation force.

"I don't care if they stay for 20 years," said a Palestinian civilian who distrusts Syrian motives in Lebanon. "If they can stop the killing, let them stay forever."

Syrian Intentions Unknown
It seems that no one outside the Syrian military command, and the office of Lebanon's President, Elias Sarkis — is the nominal commander of the Syrian force that so far is the only active contingent of a multinational Arab force of 30,000 men knows when the Syrians will drive to the city center. The Syrians began their current operation Wednesday at dawn, taking control of the Damascus-Beirut highway where it enters the city and encircling the seashore capital on land.

There is speculation that, for public relations reasons, the Syrians are waiting for promised forces from other Arab countries to join them in the potentially dangerous task of moving through the middle of the battle zone downtown. It is more likely, however, is that the Syrians are compiling intelligence on what awaits them.

Judging from the positioning of their forces, the Syrians could advance in at least three directions—through west Beirut held by the Lebanese moslem-leftists and Palestinians, through east Beirut held by the Lebanese right-wing Christians, or straight down the line dividing the two warring camps.

Some Gunmen Beyond Control
While Lebanese leftist and rightist leaders assert that their forces will accept what many of them see as de facto Syrian occupation, the leaders do not have firm control over the actions of some of the zealous men allied with them.

For example, today, the 23d day of the current officially declared cease-fire, the 56th in 19 months of civil war, there was shelling by both sides.

In the mountains to the east of the capital, eight Phalangist Christians were reportedly abducted and murdered by leftists. Apparently in retaliation, 155 millimeter artillery shells began hitting a market in west Beirut at 11 A.M. There is no military headquarters in the area, only a school, a mosque and the open market.

Nine persons were killed and 20 seriously injured in the attack, according to the survivors who stood a while later looking at the mixture of broken glass, shattered cars, lemons and blood.

A neighborhood civil defense patrol made a careful check of a correspondent's credentials, explaining that the enemy sometimes sent agents into a shelled neighborhood to learn the accuracy and impact of the attack.

A few hours later, the right-wing Phalangist radio reported that four people had been killed and eight injured by shells coming from the leftist side and landing in the Christian sector of Ashrafieh.

Violence also erupted yesterday among Palestinians manning a defense barrier on the edge of the capital that is soon to be surrendered to the Syrians.

For reasons that are unclear, armed men of Al Fatah, the major Palestinian guerrilla group, and a splinter faction called the General Command of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine quarrelled and had a brief machine-gun battle. No one was reported killed.

Today, Al Fatah was in sole control of the barricade, waiting to give it up to the Syrian troops visible at another barricade a half-mile away.

Tonight, a Palestinian official said in private that the Syrian advance to the center of Beirut had been delayed until Sunday or Monday. By 9 P.M. west Beirut was being hit by artillery shells at a rate of two or three an hour. Heavy machine-gun fire rattled in various parts of the city.

U.N. Assembly Approves Resolution Telling Turkey To Withdraw From Cyprus

By KATHLEEN TELTSCH
Special to The New York Times

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., Nov. 12—The General Assembly today again demanded the withdrawal of Turkish troops that have occupied part of the island for two years.

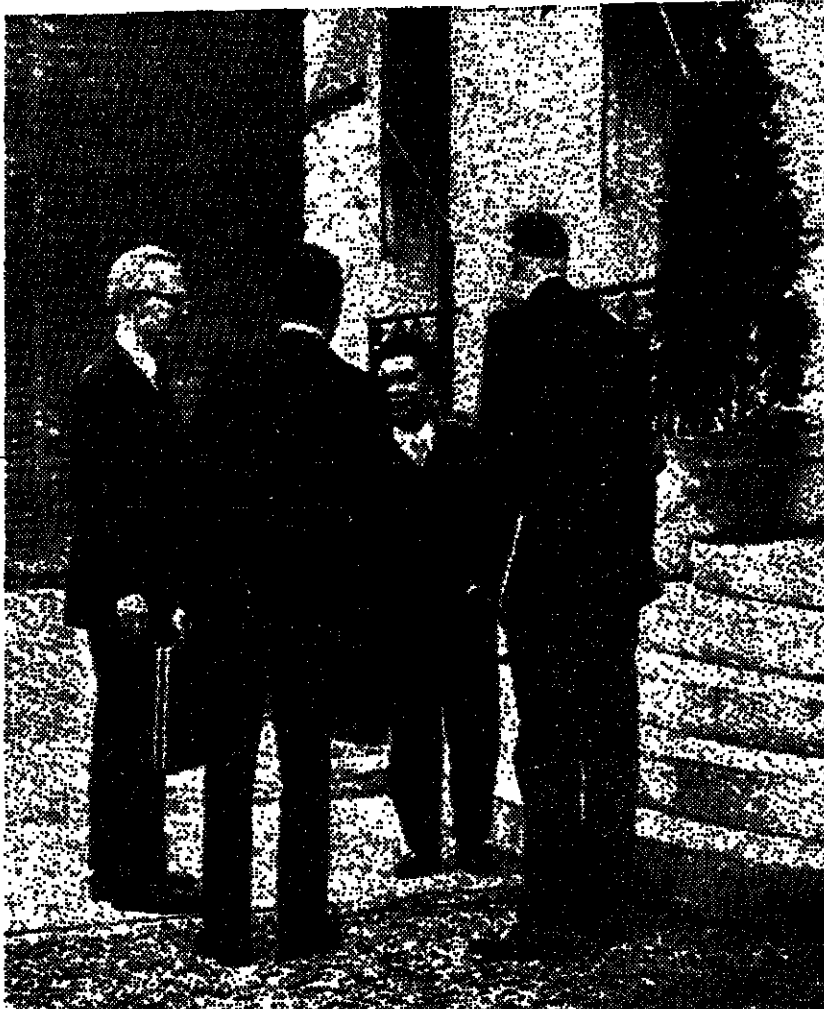

Only Turkey voted against the resolution, approved by a vote of 94 to 1. The resolution also called for an end to foreign interference and requested Secretary General Kurt Waldheim to renew efforts to secure a resumption of negotiations between the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities.

The United States and Western European countries were among 27 countries that abstained. Some complained privately that the resolution went too far in describing the Cyprus situation as endangering international peace and expressing hopes that "appropriate steps" would be taken by the Security Council.

Action by Council Expected
Members of the group of third-world countries that jointly proposed the text denied that the intention was to threaten Turkey with the use of sanctions that only the Council can impose, but they said they expected that the Cyprus issue would be taken up by the Council in due course.

Western diplomats were not optimistic about the prospects for progress in resolving the lingering dispute. With Turkish troops continuing to hold 40 percent of Cyprus, there is a widespread view that for all practical purposes the island has been partitioned.

Diplomats continue to express the hope that there will be a resumption of talks between the representatives of the two communities if not soon, possibly in the New Year. The Government of Archbishop Makarios clearly expects to get more support from the Administration of President-elect Jimmy Carter because of campaign speeches they interpret as more favorable to their position.

U.S. and Vietnam Confer in Paris; First Formal Talks Since the War

American delegate, is the second-ranking diplomat in his embassy here, where he is in charge of political affairs.

No substantive change in the American-Vietnamese relationship was considered likely to develop before the Carter administration takes office in January.

In advance of today's meeting, Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger had issued instructions that all comment, beyond a bare announcement that it took place, must come from Washington.

The United States Embassy here did issue a statement saying that "issues of interest to both countries were raised, with the missing-in-action issue our primary concern" and referring further questions to the State Department.

The reason for the imposition of the type of intense secrecy that surrounded the negotiations Mr. Kissinger held leading up to the 1973 Paris peace accords was not explained. The talks were deliberately held at the level of embassy officials, it was understood, to make clear their tentative, probing status.

U.S. Confirms Meeting
"We can confirm," the United States said in its statement, "that today our deputy chief of mission met with the counselor of the embassy of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam." That is the new name for the country adopted in Hanoi after the formal unification of North and South Vietnam earlier this year.

The talks were held at the house in suburban Neuilly that had served as the embassy of the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam, Hanoi's Vietcong negotiating partner during the four-year Paris conference with the United States and the now defunct Saigon government. The house is now an annex of the Hanoi embassy here.

The initial position of each side as they resumed formal contact were well known. On the American demand for an accounting for the missing servicemen, the Vietnamese say they are willing to do their best to fulfill that obligation under the 1973 accords, but only on condition that the United States fulfills its pledge of postwar reconstruction aid at the same time.

During the pre-election debates, both President Ford and Jimmy Carter said they would veto Hanoi's admission to the United Nations unless the missing-in-action list were cleared up, Vietnam's application for membership comes up before the Security Council again next week.

Delay Till After Election
When it came up two months ago, the issue was postponed until after the American election. Previously the United States had twice blocked the admission of the Vietnamese, but those vetoes were cast against separate applications submitted last year by North and South Vietnam.

Mr. Gammon, the American delegate at the talks, is a 52-year-old career diplomat from Texas who had served in a number of European embassies and was in the State Department from 1970 until he came to Paris in September 1973.

During his last two years in Washington, his title was deputy executive secretary of the executive secretariat in the State Department, meaning he worked on Mr. Kissinger's staff.

After the Paris accords were signed in January 1973, the United States continued negotiations for a time. They went on while withdrawal of American troops was completed, American prisoners were released, and the United States participated in de-mining Haiphong harbor and North Vietnamese coastal waters.

From the beginning, Vietnam's demand for reconstruction aid, which it at first called reparations, and the American demand for a full accounting of missing Americans were central issues. The talks broke down after a few months, and when Hanoi began the offensive that led to the fall of Saigon last year, Washington said it was no longer bound by the promise of aid since Hanoi had violated the cease-fire.

The missing-in-action issue became a heated one in American politics, and in effect provided Hanoi with bargaining leverage.

The Vietnamese have important political and economic goals. They are already in contact with American oil companies about renewing offshore exploration contracts, and have made clear their eagerness to get outside help for a rapid reconstruction and development effort.

Apart from a desire for aid and trade with the United States the establishment of relations with Washington would make it easier for Hanoi to get substantial credits in Europe.

American officials believe that Hanoi wants American and European aid and trade not only to speed economic development but also to give it a source of support other than that of the Russians and Chinese.

U.S. Rules Out Shift
WASHINGTON, Nov. 12—The State Department said today that no progress occurred in the first round of talks with Vietnam in Paris to warrant any change in the American position to veto Vietnam's application for United Nations membership if it comes to a vote next week.

All of the missing are believed dead, but Vietnam is thought to possess information on how several hundred died or where their remains are.

Robert L. Funseth, the department spokesman, reported that the two sides had said they would study each other's statements but that no decision was made on when to meet again.

Vietnam Willing to Continue
PARIS, Nov. 12 (UPI)—The Vietnamese Embassy said in a statement after the meeting it was ready to discuss the American demand for information about Americans missing in action but insisted the United States must help pay for Vietnam's reconstruction.

"The American side is dutybound to fulfill its obligations as to helping to cure the wounds of the war and postwar reconstruction in Vietnam and thus carrying out the agreement reached in the mixed economic commission in Paris in 1973," the embassy said.

"This is not only a legal question, but a question of honor, responsibility and conscience."

U.S. NOW LISTS MOSCOW AS AN 'UNHEALTHY POST'

MOSCOW, Nov. 12 (AP)—The Soviet capital, never regarded as a cushy post for American diplomats, is now being listed as an "unhealthy post" and hardship benefits for embassy employees are being improved.

An administrative notice circulated at the embassy today said Moscow's listing as unhealthy, effective Dec. 1, was "based upon the [State] Department's evaluation of reported environmental conditions regarding sanitation and disease, medical and hospital facilities and climate."

The post differential, sometimes referred to as a hardship allowance, was increased Oct. 1 from 15 to 20 percent of salary for diplomats and other embassy employees in Moscow.

Embassy officials said one factor in the worsening conditions for Moscow is the prevalence of glandular, an intestinal disorder that is believed to be spread by drinking water. Not included in the hazards given by embassy sources was the persistent microwave radiation of the embassy building, disclosed nearly a year ago.

By A. H. RASKIN
A Chicago attorney for the principal welfare fund of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters confirmed yesterday that the fund was considering citing Richard G. Kleindienst as an individual defendant in its $14 million fraud suit against five insurance companies, but he stressed that no final decision had yet been made.

A spokesman for the Central States, Southeast and Southwest Areas Health and Welfare Fund had reported Thursday that the formal complaint was already in process of revision to include the former Attorney General's name along with those of other corporate and individual defendants.

However, James L. Coghlan, the fund's lawyer, said that a definitive judgment would be deferred until the fund had completed its efforts to chart the flow of millions of dollars it had paid in insurance premiums earlier this year through a maze of corporate shells reputedly used to divert much of it into the pockets of four alleged conspirators.

Israel Protests to Envoy of U. Over Vote at U.N. on Arab

By WILLIAM E. FARRELL
Special to The New York Times

JERUSALEM, Nov. 12—Israel today accused the United States of practicing "discrimination" in the United Nations Security Council last night by endorsing a consensus criticizing Israel's continued occupation of the Arab territories it has held since the 1967 war.

The Israeli Foreign Minister, Yigal Allon, summoned Ambassador Malcolm Toon to a meeting in Tel Aviv to express displeasure over the United States vote and to instruct Mr. Toon to inform Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger about Israel's "deep sorrow" over the "discrimination."

Israel was particularly distressed that the United States vote was in a Security Council debate initiated by Egypt. This, Israeli officials felt, discriminated in Egypt's favor at a time when Israelis and others felt that new diplomatic moves toward an overall Middle East peace settlement were in the offing, with the United States playing a leading role.

The Israeli Foreign Ministry said that Mr. Allon had told Mr. Toon that Israel was aware of the existence of disagreements between the two governments on the subject of the occupied Arab territories but that there was no necessity of voicing them "every hour" and in "every place."

The Israeli radio reported that Mr. Allon had greeted Mr. Toon with an icy "Good morning" and that he had added: "I say good morning only out of convention. I'm very disappointed by the American vote."

The Foreign Ministry later denied that Mr. Allon had been so abrupt. A statement from the American Embassy said only that Mr. Allon and Mr. Toon "had a vigorous exchange of views" in which both sides made known their positions.

The American action was seen by some officials here as marking the end of the pre-election diplomatic hullabaloo over the Arab territories—a hullabaloo during which the Security Council had held a series of sessions for initiatives in the Middle East diplomacy.

For some time now, top Israeli officials have been predicting that the renewed diplomatic initiative and that this could in fact be a turning point in the frictions between Israel and the Arab world.

A Question of "Secure
Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin recently said that the 1967 war "neither the Right nor the Left have accepted the reality of what we call a 'secure' and we have yet to see with the Palestinian issue."

The Security Council and the United States support a Security Council resolution at Egypt's request on the occupied territories, members then agreed on a pressing "grave anxiety on the present serious situation in the occupied territories as a result of Israeli occupation."

Among other things, it called on Israel to "insure" the "security" of the territories, "strongly deplored" the continued establishment of settlements in the territories and called on Israel to "take any measures which tend to change the status."

The American statement, the declaration nevertheless much of the criticism of the Security Council has been "largely one-sided."

that the alignment forged at Riyadh offers the best hope of producing a responsible Arab negotiating position. The so-called "rejection front" of Arab politics, including Iraq, Libya and the Palestine Liberation Organization, which have always taken an extreme position against Israel, clearly lost ground at Riyadh.

Egypt's Move Amoyed U.S. at First
Informed diplomats said that the United States had initially conveyed its annoyance, both here and in Cairo, that Egypt had brought the issue of the occupied territories to the Security Council at this time for no convincing reason.

In subsequent discussions, however, the Americans involved were impressed by what they called Egypt's "reasonable" attitude—in contrast with the acrimonious statements that the Egyptian delegate, Ahmed Esmat Abdel Meguid, made in the public Council debate.

On one key point of the Council's statement, for instance, warning against "profanations of the Holy Places," the United States had been willing to caution "Israeli and local [Moslem] authorities" against possible provocations. Egyptian negotiators preferred to leave out any specific citations, and persuaded their Arab colleagues to go along with language even milder than what Washington had suggested.

The discussions between the United States and the Arab nations led both Mr. Kissinger and American representative William W. Scruggs to say that the United States would support a move among the Arabs, without time weakening the fundamental American relationship.

Middle East experts in Washington critical of Israel of opposing effect from the strengthening the hard-line country. In this case, the action could also encourage movements among Palestinian territories.

Acknowledging this, officials expressed confidence that possible strains in United States relations with Israel were about to be smoothed out by any real strengthening ties to the Arab world.

Next week, a spate of speeches is expected by Assembly begins debate of Palestinian rights. At a Palestine Liberation Organization were sorely weakened by Lebanon, the Arab government necessary to heighten the effort to a Palestinian reversal.

The Attorney General would mediate reply. Mr. Ables' letter by messenger to a major news organization received it at about the same time.

He said that Justice Department used "pressure tactics" in dealing with Pacific employees. The Intelligence Agency had told of the "real target of the investigation" in the Congress of the United States, the President of South Korea. He said employees of the presumably deliver testimony under subpoena.

Teamsters Report No Move Yet to Cite Kleindienst

Mr. Coghlan said it would take at least 10 days to complete the review. "Anybody that had any contact with the flow of that money from the day it left our bank is under consideration as a possible defendant, in greater or lesser degree," the lawyer added.

In testimony before the Securities and Exchange Commission on Sept. 3, Mr. Kleindienst acknowledged that he had served as middleman in persuading Frank E. Fitzsimmons, president of the teamsters, to swing the fund's insurance business to the old Security Life Insurance Company of Kansas City. He shared a $250,000 fee for that service with Thomas Webb Jr., another Washington attorney.

Civil Suit by S.E.C.
A civil suit subsequently filed in Washington by the S.E.C. names Old Security and four smaller companies as instruments in a plot to misappropriate more than $3 million. The same companies are defendants in the teamster suit.

Mr. Coghlan disclosed that Mr. Kleindienst's role in the transaction had not been confined to lining up the original contract. He said that the Attorney General had accompanied Borden, one of the alleged conspirators, to a Chicago meeting June 15 in the offices of Daniel J. Shaughnessy, director of the welfare fund.

The purpose of the meeting, Mr. Coghlan, was to see head's permission to switch account from Old Security to American Life Insurance Co., a smaller company, and his associates had established.

Mr. Shannon flatly rejected the account had been transferred anyway. "From the timing of the transfer had occurred by and Kleindienst every came to non," Mr. Coghlan said.

Release of Patricia Hearst Asked; Judge Likely to Rule in a Few Days

Court Says It's Concerned About Her Safety—Prosecutor Warns That She Might Flee

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 12—Lawyers for Patricia Hearst asked Judge William H. Orrick Jr. in Federal District Court today to release her on bail pending appeal of her conviction for bank robbery. Judge Orrick said he would study the motion. He is expected to rule in several days.

"The court is concerned about her safety," Judge Orrick said in response to a statement by Miss Hearst's attorney that she had received threats because she was cooperating with the Government in the prosecution of other members of the self-styled Symbionese Liberation Army.

If Judge Orrick grants Miss Hearst's request, she must then post the $500,000 bail set in Los Angeles pending her trial in January on charges of assault with a deadly weapon, kidnaping and robbery in connection with a shootout at a sporting goods store there. Albert Johnson, one of her attorneys, said they would ask to have that amount reduced.

Bailey Asks for Re-trial
F. Lee Bailey, Miss Hearst's attorney, also made a request for a retrial on the ground that the prosecution withheld evidence during Miss Hearst's trial that would have helped prove her innocence. Judge Orrick also said he would consider that motion and rule later.

The bail question focused on whether Miss Hearst would flee if released. Mr. Bailey said that Miss Hearst had been cooperating fully with Government officials in the prosecution of a number of criminal cases and that if she were released on bail "she would have nowhere to run as well as no desire to."

He was referring to Miss Hearst's willingness to testify against her former underground traveling companions, Wendy Yoshimura and William and Emily Harris. The Harrises are charged with kidnaping

Miss Hearst on Feb. 4, 1974, with other members of the underground group who were later killed in the shootout with the police.

Mr. Bailey also said that, in the probation reports and in the numerous psychiatric reports on Miss Hearst, no one has characterized her as a flight risk. "In fact, some of the doctors reported that she held her captors in disdain and was no longer emotionally, psychologically or ideologically committed to the members of the group that kidnaped her," he said.

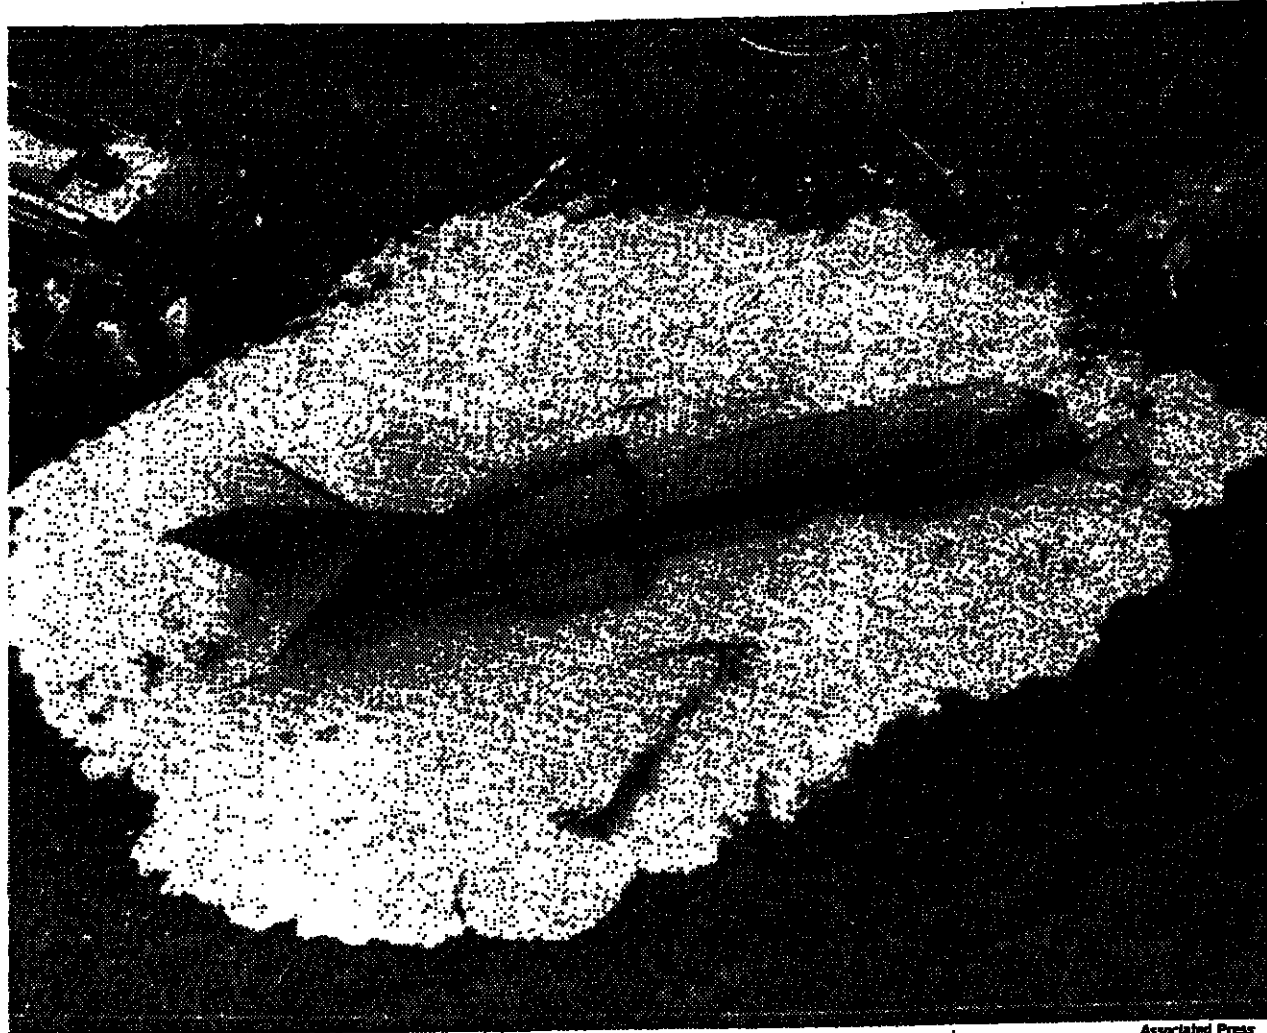

Prosecutor Fears Flight
James Browning, the United States Attorney who prosecuted Miss Hearst, opposed the bail request on grounds that Miss Hearst was a flight risk.

Judge Orrick asked the prosecutor, "In the light of her extensive cooperation with authorities, don't you think that her attitude has changed—180 degrees?"

Mr. Browning answered, "Anyone convicted and facing incarceration is even more likely to flee."

Miss Hearst's lawyers would not disclose any of the security arrangements proposed for her if she is released, other than to say that she would be with her family.

Miss Hearst, who is serving a seven-year sentence and will be eligible for parole in 14½ months, was not present in the courtroom today, but her parents were. She was transferred from the Federal prison in Pleasanton, 60 miles from here, early Tuesday morning to a Federal facility in San Diego. Her lawyers said she was transferred because of death threats but would not elaborate. They said that she was now being kept in solitary confinement in San Diego for security reasons.

Utah Official Indicates It Is Likely Slayer's Death Sentence Will Stand

By GRACE LICHTENSTEIN

SALT LAKE CITY, Nov. 12—George W. Lattimer, chairman of the State Board of Pardons, indicated today that there was a good chance that the board would uphold the death sentence of Gary Mark Gilmore, the murderer who has pleaded with the courts to be executed without further delay.

Mr. Gilmore had been scheduled to die before a firing squad next Monday, and the Utah Supreme Court refused on Wednesday to block the execution. But yesterday, Gov. Calvin L. Rampton stayed the execution until the pardons board could review the sentence, as required by law.

Through his lawyer, Mr. Gilmore said today that he was "disgusted" by the State's action.

So much legal confusion hovers over the case that other parties, including the American Civil Liberties Union, are expected to try to delay the execution through the courts.

Mr. Lattimer, chairman of the three-man pardons board, said today that unless there were mitigating circumstances, "I would think capital punishment should not be interfered with."

However, Mr. Lattimer and various other lawyers believe that, even if the board allowed Mr. Gilmore's death sentence to stand, it could take more than a month before it was carried out.

Board Meeting to Be Open
The law says that the trial judge must set a new date if the board upholds the penalty. The law also says the execution must take place at least 30 days after the "judgment" but within 60 days. A spokesman for the state Attorney General said it was unclear whether "judgment" refers to the initial day of conviction, the day of the initial sentencing or the day of subsequent resentencing.

Mr. Lattimer, who represented Lieut. William L. Calley Jr. when he was accused of murder in connection with the My Lai killings in Vietnam, said the board meeting Wednesday at the state prison in Draper would be open to all and that Mr. Gilmore would be permitted to speak.

"I'll do everything except let them argue that capital punishment isn't appropriate. That's not our job," he said.

Blacks Gain an Edge in Boston Enrollment

By JOHN KIFNER

BOSTON, Nov. 12—Blacks in Boston's public schools, in their third year of court-ordered busing for school desegregation, now outnumber whites in the first through the 12th grades, according to school department statistics.

More than 20,000 white students, out of an original 53,593, have left the city's school enrollment since busing began here, the statistics show.

If the kindergarten grades are included, white students, who made up 57.2 percent of the total school enrollment before busing, now make up 44.2 percent of the entire system. Whites outnumber blacks by about 1,500 in the entire system.

The statistics, which have not been published here, show the continued departure of whites from the city's public schools under the Federal court desegregation order.

The latest projected enrollment figures show 29,049 blacks, 28,152 whites and 8,663 "others" in the first through the 12th grades, according to Dr. Louis Perullo, the chief school department statistician.

Last Sept. 23, the projected enrollment for the 12 grades was 28,721 blacks, 30,317 whites and 8,632 "others," which includes children with Hispanic surnames and 2,168 "others." In the high schools (Grades 9-12), the figures show 8,662 blacks, 9,687 whites and 2,226 "others."

Enrollment figures obtained through two independent sources showed slightly, but not significantly, different figures. These statistics indicated that there were 29,173 blacks, 28,429 whites and 8,787 "others" in Grades 1 through 12. The reasons for the discrepancies were not immediately clear.

One significant aspect of the figures is the larger concentration of black students in the lower grades. For the future, this could mean that the black percentage of the school system will continue to increase.

Direct comparison with past years is somewhat difficult because school department officials said the only records they had available showed the racial breakdown on a kindergarten through 12th grade basis. They are only now making the somewhat more detailed first to 12th grade breakdowns to satisfy the Federal court, Dr. Perullo and others said.

Nevertheless, the figures indicate that there has been a sharp decline in white enrollment since the court order. In the light of the number of white students remaining in the public schools only during the kindergarten years, the decline is more precipitous in the first through the 12th grades.

There had been a steady decline of about 3,000 white students annually in recent years, for a variety of reasons, including the general population shift to the suburbs, until the court order.

Enrollment Figures Compared
In 1973, according to the school department figures, there were 53,593 whites in the kindergarten through the 12th grade, and 31,963 blacks. In 1974, when busing began, there were 44,957 whites and 31,737 blacks. In 1975, when the desegregation plan was expanded to cover nearly all of the city, there were 36,243 whites and 31,092 blacks.

This year, according to Dr. Perullo's projected enrollment figures, there are 33,228 whites and 31,910 blacks in the kindergarten through the 12th grade.

The enrollment of "others" has remained relatively steady at around 9,000. What appears to be happening in Boston, according to many observers, is not so much "white flight" from the city itself as a departure from the public schools in favor of parochial schools, private schools and new "academies" in the white neighborhoods, or registering from the homes of relatives in nearby suburbs to go to other public schools.

Dr. Perullo said that 5,151 students, 3,448 of them white, had transferred out of the school system since last June, although that number had been largely offset by new students moving in. He said data were not yet available on who the new students were.

A total of 1,952 students, 1,595 of them white, had transferred to parochial schools, according to the school department statistics. There were 573 students, 419 of them white, who left for private schools in Boston or elsewhere in Massachusetts. In addition, 1,509 students, 1,062 of them white, moved to Massachusetts public schools outside of Boston.

FORD'S BOYHOOD HOME HITS HARD TIMES: The boarded-up home of President Ford in Grand Rapids, Mich., has been damaged by vandals, and efforts by a restoration committee to raise money to repair it have slowed now that Mr. Ford is a lame-duck President. Since the city bought the vacant house from the Veterans Administration, the Ford Commemorative Committee has made minor repairs. But since Mr. Ford's defeat, by Jimmy Carter, plans to commemorate Mr. Ford in his home town have stalled.

Air-Controller Raise Offered, but Union Head Objects

By RICHARD WITKIN

The Civil Service Commission announced yesterday a compromise on pay scales for flight controllers that it was hoped might head off a tie-up of air traffic threatened for as early as Monday.

The decision, reversing a previous stand of the commission staff, approved higher pay scales for a sizable, though as yet unspecified, number of air-traffic controllers.

But the head of the 14,000-member controllers' union, John F. Leyden, objected angrily to the vagueness of some of the language and said that, as it stood, the decision was "unacceptable."

Mr. Leyden called the frequently delayed decision "so replete with uncertainties and so nebulous that immediate clarifications are required to avert a wave of confusion in the air-traffic system."

These remarks were viewed in the industry as a strong warning that, unless there are new assurances over the weekend, there could be another union action such as the one that snarled air traffic for several days in July.

An emergency meeting was called for this morning between Mr. Leyden and the head of the F.A.A., Dr. John L. ... to handle air traffic "by the book." This type of operation, the union contends, simply means that controllers adhere strictly to rules on spacing of aircraft "barring" the rules to expedite the flow of planes.

Nonunion experts disagree, saying the controllers accomplish their slowdown by building in extra cushion or spacing between planes, and taking extra time responding to pilots' radio calls.

In any case, the slowdown ended when the F.A.A. committed itself to expediting a final decision on the controllers' salary demands. The agency, in addition, supported the controllers' demands for some upgrading, though not as much as the union wanted. The Civil Service Commission's decision appeared to go slightly further toward meeting the union's requirements than had the F.A.A.

The chief objections Mr. Leyden found in the commission decision, which would not go into effect, in any case, until early next year, were in the repeated use of the word "probably."

The commission said, for instance, that the upgrading from GS-13 to GS-14 facilities "probably" extend to about nine facilities. Observers close to the negotiations said the commission's intent was that it would mean eight to 10 control stations. But Mr. Leyden, in a telephone

Male, Ending Vacation, Eager Begin Working on Transition

By ERNEST HOESENDOERF
Special to The New York Times

V. I., Nov. 12—Vice President F. Mondale emerged from a seclusion here today to say he was going to the transition control of the Government.

Mr. Mondale declined to comment directly on the decision by Gov. Wendell R. Anderson of Minnesota, who is also a Democrat, to resign so that he could be appointed as the Senator's successor and denied that any date for his own resignation had been set.

Mr. Mondale and his wife met reporters this morning as they arrived by boat from the hotel three miles away in St. Thomas.

He showed the reporters and cameramen around and took them up to the veranda of the Mondales' cottage, which overlooked a beach they shared with several other families.

His reading materials on a bedroom table included a pictorial guide to St. John, a Newsweek magazine report of the election results, and two history books—"The Reason Why," an examination of the Crimean War by a British historian, Cecil Woodham-Smith, and "The Armada," by Garrett Mattingly, an American.

A history enthusiast, Mr. Mondale said he had avoided books on American history on this trip "because I've read so many of them."

Reporter whether he would be oriented toward domestic or international matters, Mr. Mondale candidate debates and said he expanded and made per-

WELLESLEY, Mass.—"It's turned into a big joke." That comment by Julie Cohn, a junior at Wellesley College, summed up the prevailing attitude on campus here seven months after a father's charges of promiscuity in the student dormitories aroused a storm of opposition and distress.

The accusation by the father, John William Galbraith of Saddle River, N.J., was spotted recently in the Junior Show, the biggest student production of the year, provoking laughter from packed houses comprising parents and the entire college.

Reactions "somewhere between indifference and resentment," as Peggy O'Neil, a senior, put it, also surfaced in interviews conducted with students and the administration of Wellesley.

The controversy began last April, when Mr. Galbraith sent a letter to all parents of the 2,000 students at the century-old, women-only college. It was filled with accusations of widespread "sexual immorality" because of unlimited dormitory visiting hours, which have been in effect six years.

Administration Said to Default

Mr. Galbraith, whose daughter, Rachel, was graduated from Wellesley the following month, painted a lurid picture of half-naked, "unknown men of unknown ethics" prowling the halls, monopolizing the bathrooms or sequestered in sin with the maidens of Wellesley. He charged the faculty and trustees with abandoning their surrogate parental "obligation to provide a moral environment."

The letter urged parents to sign enclosed petitions either endorsing Mr. Galbraith's stand, which would ban men from dormitories, or indicating approval, as he worded it, "of the sexual freedom" permitted in students' residences.

His actions forged a virtually united front of opposition on campus, provoking statements from Wellesley's president, Barbara W. Newell, the board of trustees, the alumnae association and the faculty.

An overwhelming majority of the students, in meetings, letters to the campus newspaper and interviews, also expressed dismay, anger and contempt at what they viewed as Mr. Galbraith's erroneous and unfair point of view.

Parental Sentiment Withheld

The unknown component was the degree of support for Rachel's father in the parents' responses. Their letters to Mr. Galbraith ultimately totaled 524, but he refused to comment to reporters on the dispute he had aroused. Recent attempts to interview him at his Saddle River home also proved unavailing.

Mr. Galbraith met in July with Wellesley's board of trustees, reading his indignation and presenting 17 excerpts from parents' answers, all in favor of his views.

The board members responded by reiterating their "great confidence" in Wellesley's administration and in what they called the maturity and good judgment of the student body.

In an interview the other day, Nelson Darling, the board chairman, would comment only that "a large number of parents expressed concern—legitimate concern—over the quality of life in the dormitories.

In August, when many Wellesley students were at home on vacation, parents received a second letter from Mr. Galbraith. He deplored the trustees' failure to take action to remedy "this shoddy way of life" at Wellesley. He suggested that parents should once again rouse themselves, this time in letters to the trustees and college administration and in conversations with their daughters.

A Dozen Opposed

The upshot was a trickle of letters to Wellesley. Of the 17 parents who responded, a dozen opposed Mr. Galbraith's crusade, which several characterized as a vendetta. Two parents expressed worry and three said he was right.

Frederick Fawcett 2d of Boston, whose daughter, Amy, is a junior and whose mother and wife are Wellesley alumnae, erupted at the second Galbraith letter.

He wrote to President Newell that he was horrified and disgusted with "Mr. Galbraith's rantings," and went on:

"Let us now hope that by treating the latest nonsense with the complete lack of attention that it richly deserves, both it and its author and instigator will dry up and fade away for the sake of the college and its administration, faculty and students who have been so badly maligned by such false mistrust."

Another parent, E. Jefferson Murphy of Cos Cob, Conn., also disagreed sharply with Mr. Galbraith's position.

"I cannot imagine," he wrote, "that the majority of Wellesley parents are in agreement with your retrograde stance and the myopic perceptions upon which it is based."

"Unhealthy Environment"

Mr. Murphy said he was disturbed by what he called Mr. Galbraith's insistence on playing on parents' anxieties and causing publicity that suggested that Wellesley students lived in an "unhealthy environment." This, Mr. Murphy said, "is simply not true."

A Wellesley alumna and mother, Mary Heinrichs Garner, said she had written the college administration and the trustees for treating Wellesley students as "women, not helpless children."

By now, the students are dismissing the Galbraith furor of the spring-as a "nonissue." They report parents had thrown the letter in their trash basket called him "a pc using the mails for harassment."

The students said class extracurricular activities most in their minds these days.

Ann Coste, an alumna who is chairman of the Committee, seemed to feel sage of time had healed since the spring. "The and then the fall," she said, "and then the other things."

And Lisa Patrick, who joined this autumn, said she had been upset by the controversy, but added that she had been relieved to see how it turned out.

Bright Jerseys Made To Wrap and Change

By BERNADINE MORRIS

"Balenciaga and Givenchy taught me to sew," China Machado remarked after the first showing of her first fashion collection.

Actually she'd been sewing all her life. The two French couturiers, seeing that she knew something about the work, taught her the fine points: how seams should be placed, the way different fabrics moved on the body.

She knew the designers well, since for 10 years she was a leading couture model in Paris. With her striking, exotic looks, she was often Siamese, her father Portuguese, and she was born in Shanghai.

An Easy Model to Fit

Dressed in her working clothes (black pants, black sweater), she shrugged off compliments.

"Everybody liked to fit on me because I had no chest and no bottom," she said. "I was the easiest one to dress."

Soon after she came to this country to model, China was lured off the runway to work on Harper's Bazaar by Diana Vreeland, then the fashion editor. Recently she has styled television commercials and served as consultant to various fashion houses.

Some time ago she designed a wardrobe for fabrics. She would pick up designs she liked all over the world—sometimes they came in strange shapes—then work out ways to drape them on her body.

The bikini bottom, for example, has one hole for the leg; the rest, drapes and ties like a diaper. The pieces include a rectangle that is used for a bra, strapless or halter; a sari to drape over the bikini, and another rectangle with pointed ends that can form a cowl. There are also long pants.

Used Own Wardrobe

The five easy pieces from her own wardrobe later became best-sellers at the Vogue Pattern Service as paper patterns.

Now she has put them together for women who do not sew in a package that sells for $75. The designs are made in an assortment of jersey prints, all in lively colors, and Bloomingdale's will have them this month. The plastic bag they're packed in will carry the word "Cheena," which is the way the designer pronounces her first name.

The package is just part of the collection that will be manufactured by Pat Tennant, who also does John Kloss ready-to-wear and Stephen Burrows lounge clothes.

Evening Clothes Too

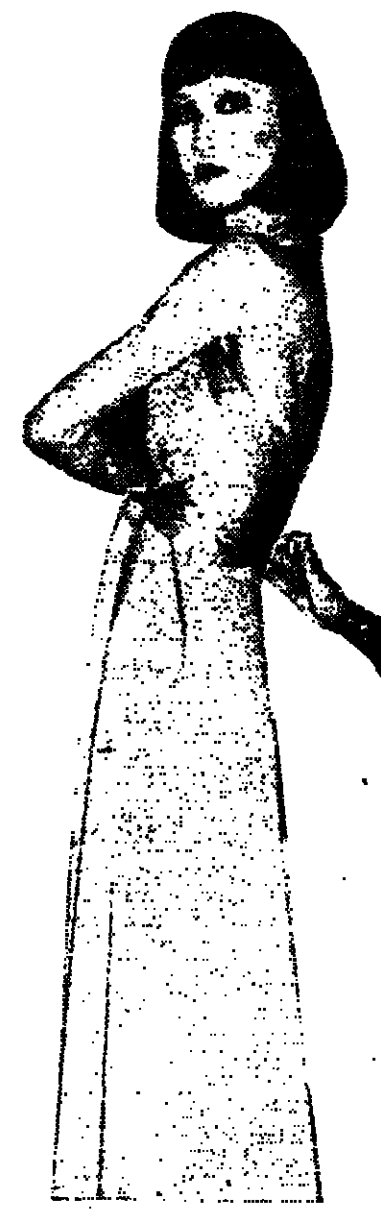

China has also designed sun dresses, day dresses and evening clothes. The evening things have the same wrap-and-change features of the Cheena package. Necklines can be adjusted, backs bared and the dresses worn back to front.

"They all give you a terrific body," the designer said. "You can cover up what's not good and show off what's great."

Two of her most fervent admirers at the introduction of her collection at Miss Tennant's quarters at the top of Henri Bendel were China's two daughters, Blanche, 16, and Manuela, 12.

"Everything was great," Blanche said. "I liked them all."

The girls are familiar with their mother's work—for years, she made their clothes.

China Machado drapes dress that can be worn four different ways.

Giving Battered Wives A Little Legal Clout

By LAWRENCE VAN GELDER

The long arm of the law is reaching out of a court in Hammond, Ind., to put some legal clout in the hands of battered wives.

In an unusual program begun last spring by an Indiana 28-year-old City Court judge, some wives are becoming court-appointed probation officers. The probationers are their violence-prone husbands.

"We tell the husband, 'Your wife is now your probation officer,'" said the judge, Jack F. Crawford. "She's an officer of this court, and we impress upon the husband that if he hits his wife process leading to revocation of probation calls for a hearing by a probation officer, followed by a hearing before a judge. The time involved, he said, might be three to six weeks, during which the beatings continue.

Under the special system, the wife-probation officer can call the judge at home or at court and complain of the husband's behavior. The judge would then order immediate revocation of probation and send the police to arrest the husband.

In the event of a violation of probation, the judge said the plan called for

"We tell the husband, 'Your wife is now your probation officer.' The husband might not think twice about hitting his wife, but he'll think twice about hitting an officer of the court."

again, he's not only hitting his wife, he's hitting his probation officer, and he's hitting somebody who works for this court—the idea behind that being that the husband might not think twice about hitting his wife but maybe he'll think twice about hitting an officer of the court."

Judge Crawford, who took office at the beginning of the year, said the idea evolved out of a discussion with some of the court's probation officers last spring, when he became concerned about repeat offenders. His court handles misdemeanors, and wife-beating is treated as assault and battery, which carries a maximum penalty of six months in jail and a $500 fine.

Affects All Classes

The judge, who holds a bachelor of science degree from Notre Dame and a law degree from Indiana University, said he had done considerable reading on wife-beating, a crime he said occurred in all socioeconomic groups.

He pointed out, on the basis of his experience, that not all battered wives sought a divorce or wanted their husbands jailed. They are often psychologically or financially dependent on their husbands, he said. Since the beating is frequently an outgrowth of excessive drinking, the wives may make comments such as: "Joe's a pretty good guy when he's not drinking. A wonderful husband. A wonderful father."

The judge added, "If the family wants to stay together, we want to do whatever we can to help the situation."

One of the virtues of the special probation system, Judge Crawford said, is that it offers speedy relief should the husband violate his probation.

a jail sentence to be served on weekends, to avoid the possibility that the offending spouse might lose his job, thus compounding the family's difficulties.

Mandatory Counseling

In addition to designating the battered wife an officer of the court, the judge said he also ordered the husband to attend psychological counseling sessions available in Hammond—again on pain of revocation of probation for failure to attend.

Since the probationary periods run from six months to a year, Judge Crawford said no conclusions could be drawn yet, although so far there have been no beatings of court-appointed probation officer wives.

"It's still too early to tell," he said. "But we're happy with it so far."

Although the judge has heard one or two wife-beating cases each week since the program started, not all victims are appointed probation officers. In fact, he said, only seven women have been chosen. Twenty others were eliminated for various reasons, including their intention to seek a divorce.

"It's only for people who want to preserve the home situation," he said, adding that it was also restricted to spouses who won't abuse their special status.

"A probation officer interviews the wife," Judge Crawford said, "and makes sure that she doesn't use this to make her husband take out the garbage or pick up his socks."

Battered husbands?

Judge Crawford has seen one case so far.

New Sassoon Style Is Over the Coun

By ANGELA TAYLOR

The father of modern hairdressing flew in from California this week to keep an eye on the launching of a new line of hair products.

Vidal Sassoon doesn't look like the Beatle type he did in 1965 when he opened his first salon here, on Madison Avenue. But at 49, he does look a lot younger than the Beatles themselves do. He frankly admits he had an "eye job" six years ago ("I hated to wake up and look at those monstrous, hereditary bags"), but the surgery had nothing to do with his slim, agile figure and his remarkable energy.

Good living does that—the sort of sensible living he and his wife, Beverly, detailed in their book "A Year of Beauty and Health," which they wrote with Camille Duké. The book spent 23 weeks on The New York Times bestseller list, which is something of a record for the genre.

"Beverly couldn't come with me," he explained. "She had exams this week." Beverly Adams Sassoon, 30—mother of Cerys, 8, Elan, 6, David, 4, and Eden, 3—was discovered by the movies when she was just out of high school. She never made it to college and when the children went off to school, she enrolled at Santa Monica College and has plans to go on to law school. What with co-authoring books, working in television and being active in the Beverly Hills P.T.A., she manages to keep as busy as her kinetic husband.

So the chairman of the board of the privately owned company, which grosses $20 million in 31 salons in 5 countries, employing 1,200 people, came alone. In his very British brown plaid suit and wide tie, he drank herb tea (he carries his own, along with wheat germ and raisins for snacking) in his Pierre Hotel suite.

Not So Revolutionary

He discussed hair. He doesn't see anything as revolutionary as his first geometric cuts—which put hair curlers and teasing combs virtually out of business—or the "wedge" cut, which since its introduction two years ago has been copied by every hairdresser from Maine to Timbuktu.

Both he and his staff are tired of the wedge. He now prefers the additional wash-and-wearability of permanently curled hair.

"With the improvement in the technology of perms, you can control them," he explained.

Since he is a health nut—both about hair and bodily and mental fitness—the new products are designed to help hair to natural good looks, rather than cosmetic cover-up. The handsomely packaged array includes an almond-scented shampoo, a finishing rinse, a moisturizer and a protein hair treatment, priced from $4 to $15.

In the generally cutthroat business of hairdressing, Vidal Sassoon manages to remain admired by his competitors. They agree that he changed the beauty salon scene radically when he opened his first shop on London's Bond Street 22 years ago and stressed precision cutting rather than the teased, weddingcake confections that made hairdressers "artists" rather than technicians.

His shop was done in crisp black, brown and white instead of Louis XIV gilt, and clients no longer hid out in private booths. His staff was young—some of them in their teens—and although they addressed the client as "Madam," they didn't make her feel like the Queen Mother. All Sassoon salons follow this plan.

Just as Courrèges put women into soldierly little dresses and white boots in the 1960's, Sassoon changed the look of women's heads. Shape was cut, rather than set. I do. The hand-held blower re standard dryer. Even opened his New York salon when the salon was established. Thers he trained spread the At least a half dozen New are now owned by former of the Sassoon "kids."

Elderly Told How To Avoid Robbers

Here is a list of things that squad members urge elderly persons to do to avoid becoming victims of crime:

Go in groups of two or three to the bank or to the supermarket. (More than 200 students at Robert Taft High School in the Morrisania area of the Bronx last week volunteered to spend at least 90 minutes a week escorting elderly citizens to banks and supermarkets.)

Always look inside your apartment building and the elevator before entering. If you see someone who does not belong there, go back on the street and ask someone to escort you to your apartment.

Never carry large sums of money, and keep cash and keys in separate places on your person.

Never open your door without looking out the peep hole. If someone says he is a police officer, ask to see his identification card.

With Social Security and welfare checks coming on the first and 15th days of the month, try to hold off for a day or two before going to the bank. If possible, have your Social Security checks mailed directly to the bank.

Establish tenant patrols in your apartment building.

Do not fight back if attacked.

Try to break down the barriers between blacks and whites in your apartment building. “If an elderly woman says, ‘Good morning, how are you today?’ one detective said, ‘I guarantee her that within three weeks her neighbors will be watching out for her.’”

These tips are part of the lecture that squad members often give at senior citizens’ centers in the Bronx. They also hand out whistles.

were arrested in a subway stakeout after the old man agreed to withdraw his life savings of $200 from a bank and hand it over to them.

According to Detective Siegel, the unit has three major problems: The fact that 40 percent of the cases, those involving youths under the age of 16, go to Family Court “and are usually recycled right back onto the street”; the legal prohibition against photographing or fingerprinting youthful offenders under the age of 16; and the fact that Family Court juvenile records are sealed.

In recent weeks, several politicians, including Mayor Beame and Robert Abrams, Borough President of the Bronx, have called on the Legislature to pass laws making Family Court records available to judges setting bail.

Their actions were prompted by the recent disclosure that Ronald Timmons, a 19-year-old robbery defendant from the Bronx who had been released on $500 cash bail, had a juvenile record that showed 67 previous arrests, one for the murder of a 32-year-old man. The judge who set bail was unaware of young Timmons’ juvenile record. The defendant later failed to show up for his Criminal Court appearance, and is now at large.

According to Detective Sullivan, the vast majority of the elderly victims his unit works with are white, while most of the perpetrators are black.

The rapidly changing racial makeup of the South and West Bronx, where the unit concentrates, probably makes this situation inevitable. The area has a staggering unemployment rate. About 80 percent of the population is black or Hispanic and predominantly poor, while the dwindling 20 percent is white and predominantly elderly and Jewish, living on Social Security.

Blacks Dispute Statistics
Many black leaders in the area dispute unit statistics showing that black youths commit most of the crimes against the elderly. They also say that crime is caused by social factors, such as high unemployment and severe poverty, and not by racial hostility.

So far, the unit has found no concrete evidence that the muggings are racially motivated. But there have been scattered incidents, Detective Sullivan said, such as a recent attempted “push-in” robbery of a light-skinned black woman in a housing project on White Plains Road. The detective explained:

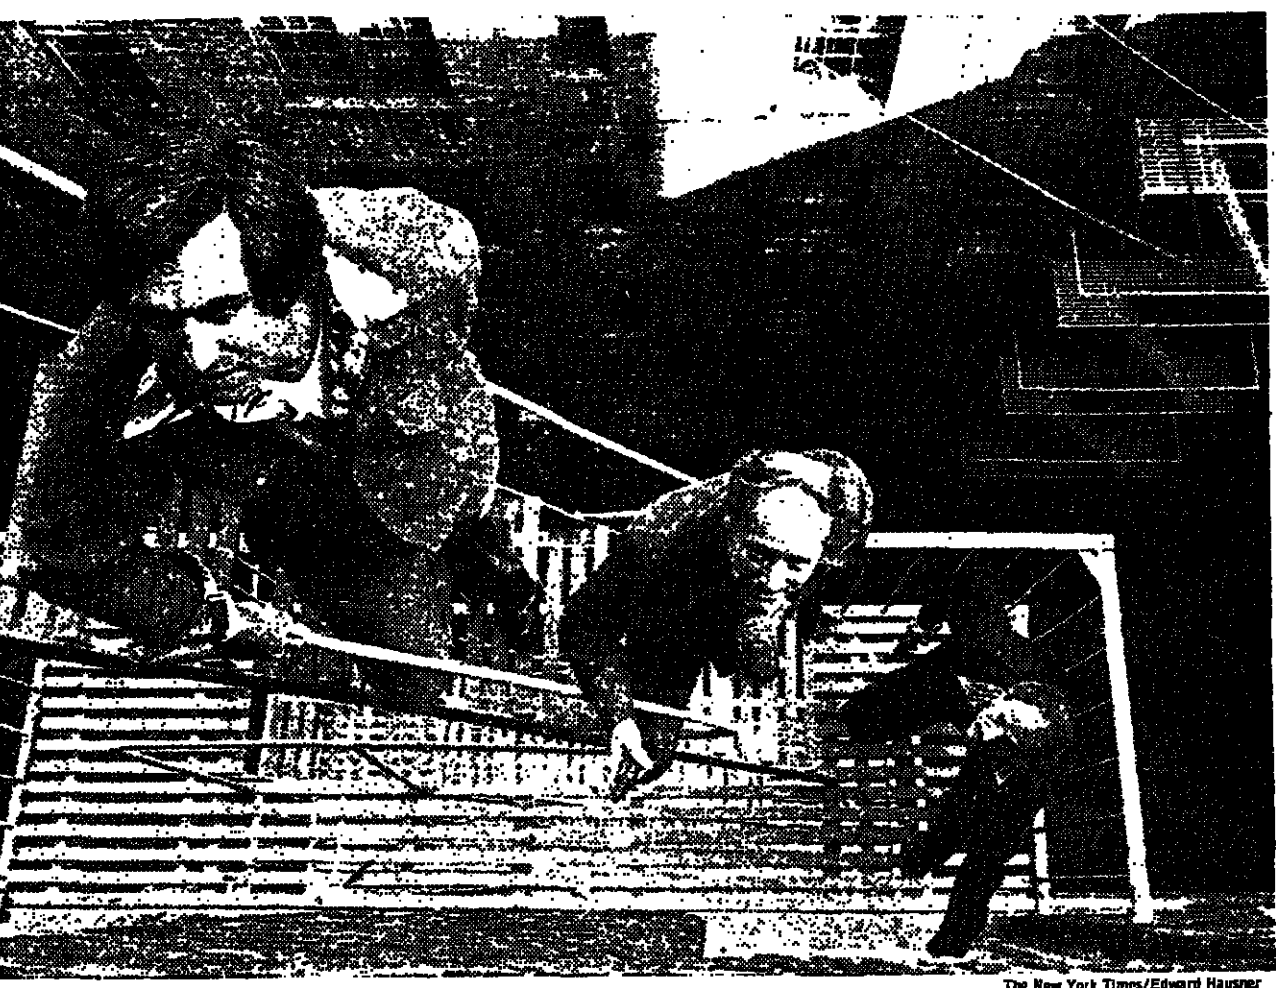

“While the robbery was taking place, the woman’s daughter came home. Her skin was darker, and the two perpetrators looked at her and said, ‘Excuse us, we thought it was a white woman. Then they left without talking anything.’”

One thing that has puzzled the police and the public is the senseless violence that often accompanies the robbing of old people. Victims have been beaten, raped, set on fire, locked in closets and tortured to death.

About 10 percent of our cases involve violence,” Detective Silverman said. “One of the reasons it happens is that the kids want to make sure they’ve gotten all of the victim’s money. They also think the beatings will make the victim tell whether he has a hidden cache of valuables.”

Youths Aware of Laws
Several members of the unit said they thought that a relatively small number of criminals, about 75 young repeaters, were committing most of the crimes against the elderly in the Bronx. Many of the most active perpetrators are below the age of 16, and the police believe the reason for their boldness is that the youths are not yet subject to adult-criminal laws.

According to law, youths under 16 cannot be confined for more than three years, regardless of the seriousness of their crime. In practice, only a handful of youths are confined more than 15 months, and most are free in less than a year.

Most members of the squad think that youths as young as 13 and 14 should be considered criminals when they commit a crime, and prosecuted as adults. So, apparently, do some of the youths’ parents.

“My kid has been in trouble 14 times, and he’s never been incarcerated,” sobbed Katie, the mother of the 15-year-old youth who had robbed Lily Stein. “He should have been locked up when he first stole that record player at the age of 12. I keep saying he needs help, but whenever he goes to court, the judge says, ‘Dismissed.’”

Katie said she had four other children, lived on welfare payments, always paid the rent on time and had been “embarrassed for years” because police cars were always stopping in front of her building to pick up her 15-year-old son.

“Either he’s going to kill or he’s going to get killed,” she shouted. “Why don’t they do something?”

The “most vulnerable time” for an elderly person, Detective Sullivan said, is when he is coming home from a bank or a supermarket. Robbers often stake out these places, he said, watching for cash to be flashed, and then follow the elderly person home and commit a push-in robbery.

Several detectives in the unit said they had become so attached to some of the elderly victims that they frequently returned to their homes to visit them. One of their favorites is 82-year-old Elizabeth Griffith, the victim of a savage beating and robbery, who calls Detectives Silverman and Siegel “my sons.”

Recently she wrote the two men a letter of appreciation in her shaky handwriting. It reads, in part:

“You two are so dedicated and have so much love and concern for the helpless old people who are like little lambs trying to survive in a den of wolves. There are so many muggers, purse snatchers and killers roaming the streets, we old people are not safe even in the day. We need thousands more like you to help clean up the jungle this city has become.”

Queens Jury Is Looking Into Zoning Payoff Charges

By MARY BREASTED
A special grand jury in Queens is looking into allegations that Robert T. Groh, former deputy borough president there, helped arrange a political payoff by executives of the Sheraton Corporation in exchange for a zoning change, sources familiar with the case said yesterday.

Donald R. Manes, the Queens Borough President, confirmed that he was one of those to be called before the grand jury, which was empaneled by the state’s special prosecutor, John F. Keenan, several weeks ago. Mr. Manes also said the Queens Democratic Party’s fund-raising records had been turned over to the special prosecutor’s office.

A spokesman for the Sheraton Corporation in its Boston headquarters said the company was “cooperating fully with the special prosecutor’s office.” But he denied that Sheraton executives were guilty of “any wrongdoing.”

The sources close to the case, who asked not to be named, said that grand jury witnesses had been asked about the financing and arrangements for two Queens Democratic Party dinners, in 1972 and 1973.

The sources also said that witnesses had been asked whether they had knowledge of any role by Mr. Groh in soliciting funds for the dinners.

The Allegations Investigated
The allegations being looked into by the grand jury are that Mr. Groh encouraged executives of the Sheraton Corporation to purchase tickets to one or more of the political dinners in exchange for help in getting a zoning variance the corporation wanted for its La Guardia Airport inn.

The spokesman for the Sheraton Corporation, Phillip Shea, vice president in charge of public relations, said that the corporation obtained the zoning change it wanted, but that the planned expansion of the La Guardia Sheraton Inn never took place. The inn has been sold to Servico Inc., which holds the Sheraton franchise there now, Mr. Shea said.

Mr. Shea denied that Sheraton executives had purchased tickets for the two political dinners under investigation.

Mr. Groh, 60 years old, was deputy Queens borough president from 1969 until April 1974, when Mayor Beame appointed him Sanitation Commissioner. He resigned from the sanitation job in September 1975 under pressure from Mayor Beame, who by then had soured on Mr. Groh because of months of complaints about filthy streets and poor management in the Sanitation Department.

Mr. Groh has just been elected Civil Court judge in the Sixth Judicial District in Queens.

Numerous messages left for Mr. Groh at his home late this week were not returned. His wife said repeatedly that he was out of town and that she did not know whether he had been called before the special grand jury.

GOING OUT Guide

PAIR OF ACES Because Eugene O'Neill's "A Touch of the Poet" and Cole Porter's "Kiss Me Kate" are seldom revived locally, their reappearance are welcome reminders of two masters.

The newly refurbished Arts Center is located at 553 West 51st Street, near 11th Avenue, in an old Irish section of Hell's Kitchen, which has ample space for parking.

SHREW CREW As for "Kiss Me Kate" this is only the second local reprise in many years, following the St. Bart's Players revival a while back, also in a church setting.

CHOICE CUTS "American Art in the 1960's," a 57-minute documentary, is today's screening at 2 P.M. in the auditorium of the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum, Fifth Avenue at 88th Street.

This is a free, weekend series of movies on American art and artists, repeated because of public response last season and with several new films added, continuing to mid-January.

A screening this afternoon at 2 o'clock, also free, will show "The Diary of Anne Frank" at the White Plains Public Library, 100 Martine Avenue.

VERSE BASE Laura Benet, poet and sister of the two late Benet brothers and author of the recent book of memoirs, "When William Rose, Stephen Vincent and I were Young," and A. V. Subramanian, lecturer and poet from India, are guest speakers this afternoon at the annual harvest festival and book fair of the New York Poetry Forum.

The public is invited to the program in the second-floor Hopkirk Room of the Williams (College) Club at 24 East 39th Street. Voluntary contributions will also include intervals of solo singing, dancing and piano music, along with book-browsing of displayed selections and readings by poets published in the Forum's Bicentennial anthology.

STRING & SWING One of the more successful family bands in country music is the Nashville-based Buck White and the Down Home Folks. Joined by Tex Logan, a Texas fiddler, the group is performing tonight at 8 o'clock at New York University's Loeb Student Center at 566 La Guardia Place. Tickets at the door are $5, and $2 for students.

Accord Reported in Parcel Strike

Construction companies in Connecticut and New Jersey have been hard hit because heavy sets of plans are usually shipped by United Parcel. One Connecticut concern in East Hartford said that about half of its plans had not been arriving.

Postal order houses and companies that normally ship many small parts and packages have been afflicted with late deliveries, higher shipping costs and canceled orders.

Postal officials here said that parcel post volume had increased 100 to 150 percent and that there have been delivery delays of three to five days as metropolitan area shippers turned to the Postal Service for getting packages to states where the workers were on strike.

Shippers in those states, by the same token, were forced to use the Postal Service or other methods to move material to the metropolitan area or to other areas outside the strike zone.

Upstate New York Affected

The states in which United Parcel Service has been halted are North and South Carolina, Virginia, West Virginia, Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine and upstate New York. The District of Columbia was also affected.

The tentative agreement was reached in Washington after two days of intensive bargaining in which top company officials and Frank E. Fitzsimmons, teamsters' president, participated. James Scarce, director of the Federal Mediation Service, also was involved.

Details of the agreement were not disclosed, but a source close to the talks said it appeared that the union had achieved its major objectives.

Before the walkout, the company had offered a wage and benefit package that it said was equivalent to the teamsters' national freight agreement. The proposal, a spokesman said, would have provided an increase of 33 percent in wages and benefits over a three-year period.

The average United Parcel wage has been about $7 an hour, with some local variations as spokesman said.

The most critical phase of the dispute, however, related to the company's plan to use an increasing number of part-time workers in its warehouse operations.

Part-time workers have been used in the Eastern states, but some local teamster leaders wanted restrictions on their use, plus full-scale benefits for such workers, which the company originally rejected.

Dissident Group Files Suit

Meanwhile, a dissident group of teamsters filed a suit in the Washington Superior Court saying that the union had deprived the 18,000 strikers of an estimated $1.3 million in strike benefits.

The dissident group, known as PROD, charged that Mr. Fitzsimmons and Ray Schoessling, teamster secretary-treasurer, had illegally subtracted $10 a week from each worker's benefits since the walkout began.

At the teamster convention last June, delegates voted to increase the weekly benefit from $25 to $35 in the first five weeks of a strike and from $35 to $45 in the remainder of the stoppage. The suit argues that the provision was to become effective immediately, but that the teamsters' leaders had declared the higher rate would be paid only in strikes beginning on or after Nov. 1.

PETER ROSENFELD OFFERS A LIVELY CELLO RECITAL

Peter Rosenfeld's cello recital at Carnegie Recital Hall Thursday night was that of a back-solid musician, steeped in the finest interpretive tradition, who happens to play the cello and does it quite well.

In other words, in Mr. Rosenfeld's performances of Beethoven's Sonata No. 1 in F and Brahms's Sonata in D (the composer's transcription of his Opus 78 violin sonata) he did not put instrumental tone quality ahead of expressive integrity.

The music pulsed with life at all times, and if the pitch and quality of sound occasionally seemed strained in the upper register, it was no great matter.

The program also included Poulenc's seldom-played Sonata (1943), George Perle's Lyric Piece (1946) and Betsy Jolas's "Scion" (1973). These, too, revealed vigorous and apt readings.

But Mr. Rosenfeld, who is a leading freelance musician here, was so persuasive with Beethoven and Brahms that his register, it was no great matter.

The splendid assisting pianist, made her best showings in the works of the Viennese masters.

Pistons Rout Knicks By 111-97 As Aching Lanier Scores 30

By PARTON KEESE
Special to The New York Times
DETROIT, Nov. 12—Everybody, including the Knicks, seemed to know that Bob Lanier, the Detroit Pistons' big man, was hurting tonight. Tendinitis in both knees, sore back, strained elbow, and so on. But the Knicks could not take advantage of it.

Despite aches and pains, the 6-foot-11-inch, 255-pound center scored 30 points, high for the game, and gained a game-high 13 rebounds to lead the Pistons to a convincing 111-97 victory over New York.

"He's much too powerful," said Coach Red Holzman. And with the rest of those Pistons players, we just couldn't run with them."

Holzman also had a key player hurting. Earl Monroe, the tricky Knicks guard was banged in the hip during a first-period melee, stayed in till the first minutes of the second half and then took himself out.

"We were leading then, remember?" Holzman said. "But when Earl got out of there, we didn't seem to have anyone who could do the things Earl can in such situations. To me, that was the key to this defeat."

Monroe, Walt Frazier and Lonnie Shelton all had 16 points for New York, but little Kevin Porter turned in his season's high of 22 for Detroit and meshed perfectly with big Lanier's contribution.

The Knicks had to overcome some awesome Pistons rebounding represented by the threesome of Lanier, Douglas and Howard Porter, who weighed an aggregate 705 pounds and averaged 6 feet 10 inches. Though the Knicks had John Gianelli at 6-10 and Shelton at 6-8, it was three against two on the boards.

Despite Detroit's outrebounding New York, 13-7, in the opening quarter, the Knicks stayed with their foes on points, and the period ended, 27-27. Both clubs sank 13 baskets, the Knicks going for the corner shot by Frazier and Monroe while the Pistons were having an easier time inside. Lanier and Douglas had 8 and 7, respectively.

Shelton Controls Boards

Kevin Porter, the dazzling little backcourtman for the Pistons, put on his jitterbug dribbling act, which often ended in a spectacular basket with no one near him. Not to let the Knicks be outshowned, Earl the Pearl responded with his deception-dribble specialty, which ended in a blind pass to Shelton for an easy layup.

The Knicks let the Pistons pull away by 4 points near the end of the half when Detroit took a 49-45 lead on Ralph Simpson's 5 straight points. But New York's Mo Layton came in with a flurry of jumpers and layups and helped the Knicks spurt to a 56-52 lead at the halftime buzzer (about the only electronic gadget that was working).

Shelton began getting the hang of beating Detroit's big man to the ball and by halftime, the Knicks' newest sensation had a total of 11 rebounds, more than twice as many as any Pistons.

The Knicks were helped by the over-aggressive Pistons' tendency to foul. New York converted 12 of 14 attempts from the foul line, compared to four of five for Detroit.

The Pistons also grew careless as the second half began, turning the ball over or letting the Knicks steal it. As a result, New York ran off to a 13-point lead, 69-56.

Monroe waved to Coach Red Holzman complaining of a bruise on his ankle, and he had to be taken out. Whether that had anything to do with it, the Knicks suddenly stopped scoring, while the Pistons got hot.

Tallying 10 points in a row, Detroit barged ahead, causing the 6,956 fans in Cobo Arena to sound like 60,956. The two Porters and Lanier were the main culprits, and even Holzman's two time-outs during this rally couldn't stop the spurge.

With most of New York's shots being blocked, just missing or never getting off, Detroit kept building its lead. It was 85-75 with 10 minutes left in the game, and the Knick coach was doing some furious thinking on the sideline.

Barnes Suspended Again

The Pistons' awesome frontline will be without Marvin Barnes for awhile longer. The big forward, who has yet play in the N.B.A., was suspended by

Judge Tells Keystone To Let Horse in Race

In a court ruling believed to be without precedent, a Federal judge ordered Keystone Race Track last night to let a horse named Wine Treasure run in today's $150,000 Heritage Stakes.

The ruling, handed down in Philadelphia by Justice Joseph S. Lord at 7:35 P.M., adds a 10th horse to the field for the 1 1/16-mile event. However, rather than change the original draw for post positions that took place Thursday, Justice Lord stipulated that Wine Treasure must start from the outside No. 10 spot.

Wine Treasure, owned by Mrs. Edith Libutti of Fort Lee, N.J., has been stabled at Laurel Race Course. He will be vanned early this morning to Keystone, on the outskirts of Philadelphia, for his appearance in the race for 2-year-olds.

The injunction capped a day of legal maneuvering by lawyers for 63-year-old Mrs. Libutti. In their show-cause complaint, the lawyers argued that their client had been deprived of due process on Thursday when the Pennsylvania State Racing Commission revoked her owner's license without a hearing rather than allow her to enter Wine Treasure in the Heritage.

Complaint From Presti
Mrs. Libutti is the mother of Bob Presti, the 44-year-old horse broker who was involved in the hidden ownership of Jim French, a top 3-year-old colt, during the spring of 1971. The Thoroughbred Racing Protective Bureau has made it clear it considers him a bad influence in the sport, and Presti, in turn, has complained of harassment. His mother is licensed to race horses in California, Florida and, since last Sept. 9, in Pennsylvania. Last Thursday, when entries were taken for the Heritage, the State Commission suspended her and denied her access to the track, thus knocking Wine Treasure out of the race.

In his ruling last night, which followed more than four hours of courtroom discussion, Justice Lord ruled that the commission "erred in making the suspension without a hearing." The reason reportedly was that a license is a property, and cannot be taken away without a hearing.

Race track personnel had been standing by at the track to conduct a new draw for post positions in the event one was needed. But the assignment of Wine Treasure to No. 10 made that unnecessary.

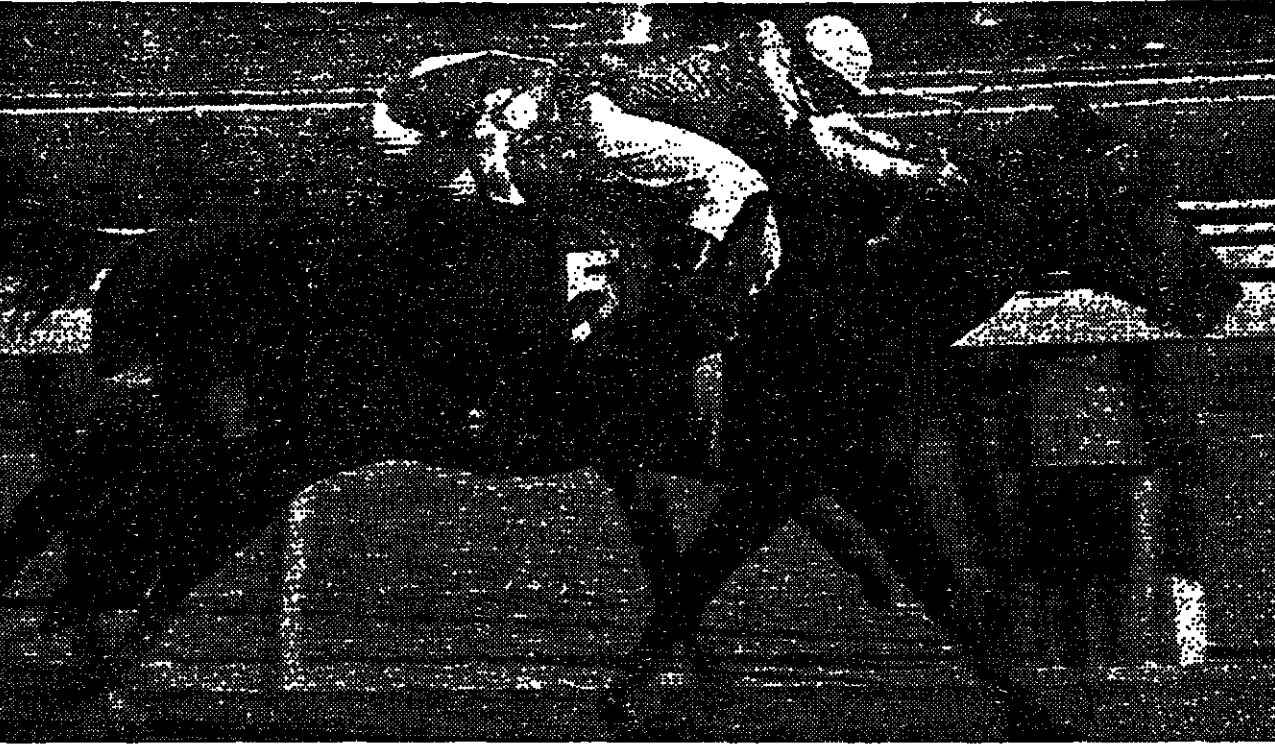

Wine Treasure Rated at 30-1

However, the ruling came too late to permit inclusion of Wine Treasure's past performances in today's Daily Racing Form. The son of Never Bend has had only three races, all of them in Florida, and those efforts, plus workouts, will be printed by Daily Racing Form on special supplementary sheets that will be distributed to purchasers of Forms today at Keystone.

"The odds won't change much," a track spokesman said. "Most of the handicappers figure him at 30 to 1."

With the outside post position, and a two-hour van ride from Maryland before the race, Wine Treasure does not figure to be in the best shape possible. Royal Ski, winner of the recent Laurel Futurity, from which Wine Treasure was barred, remained as a 9-5 favorite in the overnight line. He is owned by Gerry Cheevers, the Boston Bruin goalie.

"I'm very excited," Mrs. Libutti said from her New Jersey home in response to the ruling on Wine Treasure. "It means a lot. Maybe this will make people get off my back."

Sandy Hawley guiding Moonlight Jig to victory in fifth race at Aqueduct yesterday. Keep It Secret was second. The victory helped Hawley set the record for purse money won in a year, a total of $4,255,912 for 1976.

Jockey Sets Mark for Purse Money Won

By MICHAEL STRAUSS
Sandy Hawley, the 27-year-old Canadian, accepted the congratulatory of rival riders at Aqueduct yesterday after setting a North American record for purse money earned in one year by a jockey.

Hawley, who has been riding only since 1968, created the new high at race first, a second and a third place finish on yesterday's card. The day's work was worth $10,440 and raised his 1976 total to $4,255,912.

"I knew I was within striking distance of the record after receiving a phone call from a friend in Canada the night before," said Hawley. "He knew I had won with Americo here in a stakes race a day earlier. He told me I was about $5,000 short of the record."

Figures produced by Big A's statisticians before yesterday's program showed that the 5-foot-2-inch, 106-pound jockey needed $5,588 to tie the mark of $4,251,060, set by Laffit Pincay Jr. two years ago.

Hawley began approaching his goal with a second-place finish aboard Salim Alicum (worth $2,640) in the fourth race. He won with Pomponio (value to the winner $6,000) in the fifth and then brought home Keep the Promise (751,500) in the sixth event. He finished out of the money in the first and seventh races with his only other mounts of the day.

The triumph with Moonlight Jig put the Canadian over Pincay's mark. As he returned to the winner's circle,

Anderson Brown's Date With Ivy Immortality

Flow of Brown's 25-21 victory over Dartmouth last in Anderson addressed his team. "You people," he said, "have a date with immortality at Columbia." Through nearly a century of Brown football, immortality has been broken more often than today Brown has an opportunity to share, and win, his first Ivy League championship. If the Bruins triumph at Baker Field, they are assured of at least first place with Yale; if the Bruins win while Yale loses to or ties Harvard, they will win the title for the first time since the Ivy schools were twined together formally in 1896. Not that John Anderson is surprised by the imminence of immortality. When he took command at Brown in 1973, he promised fame for the muscular scholastic he persuaded to the college that has overlooked Providence, R.I., 70 but had been overlooked by football players who an Ivy League education.

And go back to when the Paterno brothers, Joe and George, ran at a lop for Coach Rip Engle and an 8-1 won-lost record. e 23 years between Rip Engle's departure and John on's arrival, Brown had only five winning seasons. ere had been eight consecutive losing seasons, with uns never winning more than two games any year, ohn Anderson moved in from Middlebury. as happy at Middlebury, we had just had an und-season," the husky coach recalls. "As an assistant at Dartmouth, I had never been impressed by Brown. t really interested in the Brown job, but when I came for an interview I realized what a nice campus it had. really saw the campus before. I always pictured it city campus, but it's not. I knew we could recruit nely, and that's what we've done. The campus is, up on a

Not interested in football either. But that did not disturb Bob Farnham, for example. "It didn't bother me that Brown had lost before," the senior wide receiver says. "I knew that Coach Anderson had turned things around at Middlebury, and I believed he could turn them around here. He had been 9-0 at Middlebury; I liked that. Plus, I knew that he wasn't afraid to throw the ball."

Bob Farnham catches the ball—40 receptions for 495 yards and three touchdowns this season, despite double coverage; and 56 receptions for 701 yards and two touchdowns last season, when he was named to the all-East and all-Ivy teams.

The N.F.L. Prospect
"Brown had such a bad name, it was a joke," Farnham continues. "But my chemistry teacher at Andover [Mass.] High School, Frank Kennedy, is a Brown alumnus, and he got me interested in Brown my senior year. I could have gone to Syracuse, Duke, New Hampshire, Umass or Holy Cross, but I did want to go to an Ivy League school. It's a good, solid league, and you get a great education."

The sandy-haired sociology major is considered the best National Football League prospect on the Brown team despite his relatively small size for a wide receiver—5 feet 10 inches, 175 pounds.
"People keep telling me I'm too small and too slow for the N.F.L.," he says. "and I tell them, 'What do you mean I'm too small? I'm out there every Saturday; I've never been hurt in my life.' And I'm not slow. I've been clocked in 4.55 seconds for 40 yards. That's not slow. I understand that Randy Vataha of the Patriots only runs a 4.7 and that Howard Twilley of the Dolphins runs a 4.9, and I'm taller than they are. Everybody wants a wide receiver who's 6-1 and 195, but sometimes those guys can't catch the ball. The whole position is catching the ball. I catch the ball."

Not everybody at Brown is concerned with the imminent immortality of the football team.
"There are a lot of students who don't know and don't care, but I like it that way," Farnham says. "Nobody's making a big deal out of you. That's good. You can have your own life. And you keep your own life in better perspective."
His brother Mike is a wide receiver on the Brown freshman team.
"He'll get my No. 46 next year," Farnham says, "and my brother Paul is another three years away. And maybe even Glenn will get it, too—he's only 5 now."

Cowens Says Guilt Feelings Led to Decision

Dave Cowens, who shocked professional basketball by requesting and receiving an indefinite, unpaid leave of absence from the Boston Celtics on Wednesday, has attributed his decision to guilt feelings about taking his $280,000 annual salary.

"I just wasn't making a contribution or helping the team," the 6-foot-9-inch center said in an interview with The Boston Herald American. "I had no motivation or enthusiasm. It just got to a point where I felt guilty taking my salary from the Celtics."

Cowens, 28 years old, who has led the Celtics to five division titles and two National Basketball Association championships in six years with the team, was averaging 16.4 points and 15.3 rebounds a game this season, statistics that are close to his career averages.

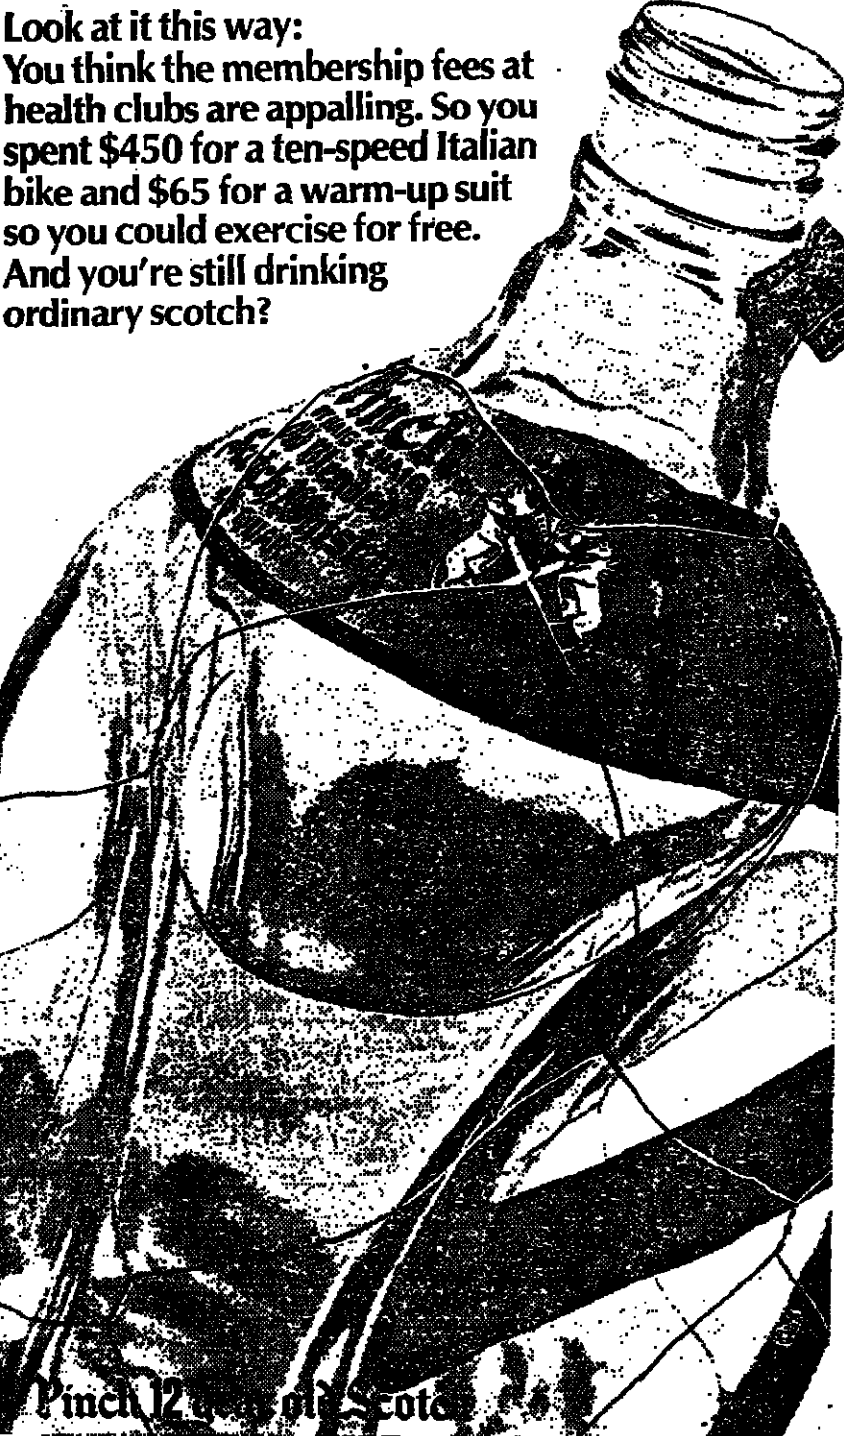

His Father Awaits Him
Attempts to reach Cowens at his office apartment in Boston were unsuccessful yesterday. His secretary said that Cowens would be unavailable for the weekend.

United Press International reached Jack Cowens, the player's father, at the Cowens home in Cold Spring, Ky. The elder Cowens said:

"Dave called me last night and said he would be home in four or five days. I expect him this weekend or by the first of next week, and we'll sit down and chat."

"I don't know what the problem is. He didn't tell me on the phone, and I didn't press him on it. He assured me he was in good health, so I'm not overly worried."

"I feel sure he will go back to the Celtics. When I don't know, but I feel that way. You have certain kinds of feelings as a parent, and I feel he'll go back."

Look at it this way:

game, she made the break that had looked inevitable with a couple of angled volleys and with the help of two missed smashes by the English player. That put her 3-1 up and another break in the sixth game, with the help of a crisp stop volley, took her to 5-1. Miss Holladay double-faulted in the seventh game, but won the next 4 points for the set.

Nastase Gains Semifinals

HONG KONG, Nov. 12 (AP)—Top-seeded Ilie Nastase and Ken Rosewall continued on their course toward the final of the Hong Kong tennis classic by winning quarterfinal matches today. Gene Mayer and Chic Hagye also advanced to the semifinals.

Nastase defeated Emilio Montero of Mexico, 6-1, 6-1. Rosewall, who is seeded third, defeated Steve Krulevitz of Baltimore, 6-3, 6-3.

Mayer, of Mendham, N. J., eliminated Paul Kronk of Australia, 6-3, 6-1. Hagye of San Diego ousted sixth-seeded Hans-Jürgen Pohmann of West Germany, 7-5, 6-3. He will meet Rosewall next.

U. S. Leads in Davis Cup, 2-0

CARACAS, Venezuela, Nov. 12 (AP)—Vitas Gerulaitis of New York defeated Hurlprey Hose, Venezuela's top-ranked player, 6-4, 6-3, 3-6, 6-4 today in a second-round singles match of the American Zone Davis Cup tennis competition. Earlier, Dick Stockton of Dallas outplayed Jorge Andrew, 6-2, 6-4, 9-7. The triumphs gave the United States a 2-0 lead in the three-day competition being held at the Altamira Tennis Club. The Americans need one more victory to advance to the next round. Hose and Andrew will meet Fred McNeil of Chevy Chase, Md., and Sherwood Stewart of Baytown, Tex., in doubles tomorrow.

While Stockton was able to pull off an easy victory over Andrew, Gerulaitis had a tougher time against Hose, a seasoned Venezuelan player. Gerulaitis played cautiously, taking advantage of the Venezuelan's errors. He kept control through the first two sets and regained it after dropping the third.

Gottfried Upsets Borg

STOCKHOLM, Nov. 12 (AP)—Brian Gottfried of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., fought off a match point today and then eliminated Bjorn Borg from the $150,000 Stockholm open tennis tournament. Gottfried, seeded eighth, won the tense two-hour battle, 6-2, 4-6, 7-6. He saved a match point when trailing, 5-6, in the tie breaker and then held on to win it 8-6.

Gottfried will meet Manuel Orantes of Spain in the semifinals tomorrow. Orantes, the third seeded player, scored a 6-4, 6-3 triumph over unseeded Haroon Rahim of Pakistan.

Jimmy Connors justified his top seeding by making quick work of Raul Ramirez of Mexico, whipping the fifth-seeded Mexican, 6-3, 6-3, on the fast indoor surface. In the semifinals, Connors will play Mark Cox of Britain, who came from behind to defeat Byron Bertram of South Africa, 6-6, 7-5, 6-2.

Dick Allen Free to Negotiate With Any Major League Club

Major league baseball's perennial bad boy Dick Allen, became a free man yesterday—free to deal with any of the 26 teams for the 1977 season.

Allen became eligible for the special free-agent draft because he signed his 1976 contract with the Philadelphia Phillies after the basic agreement between the owners and the Players Association was signed in July. Allen declared for the free-agent option last week.

The Oakland A's were the only team to draft Allen in the special re-entry draft. Under the rules of that draft, a player had to be drafted by two or more clubs or he was free to make his own deal.

Allen, a 34-year-old first baseman, batted 269 with 15 homers and 49 runs batted in for the Phillies, but his unorthodox behavior made him persona non grata with many teams. His reputation as being "difficult to handle" led to his being traded five times in the last seven years, from Philadelphia to St. Louis to Los Angeles to the Chicago White Sox to Atlanta (where he refused to report) and back to Philadelphia.

In 1972 with Chicago, Allen was named the American League's most valuable player. In 1974 he left the White Sox a month before the end of the season, saying he was "retiring."

Butch Wynegar, the Minnesota Twins' outstanding rookie catcher, and three other players signed 1977 contracts. They are Tom Johnson, a rookie pitcher with a 3-1 won-lost record and 2.61 earned-run average; Mike Cuddeback, third baseman, who batted .257 with three homers and 49 runs batted in; and Craig Kusick, first baseman, who hit .259 with 36 runs batted in. Wynegar, 20, hit .280 with 10 homers and 69 runs batted in.

Bobby Orr will lace on a pair of ice skates soon, but his permanently damaged left knee, and, if it doesn't collapse, he will be back playing defense for the Chicago Black Hawks in a week or 10 days.

Alan Eagleson, Orr's agent, said, "The swelling is all down and the knee seems to be in reasonable shape. He could play in the next week but it's going to have to be careful." Orr last played on Oct. 24. On Nov. 2, Orr's physician, Dr. John Palmer, performed an arthroscopy, which includes flushing out cartilage and tissue and observing a substantial number of chips from the lining of the bone. Orr's knee has undergone surgery five times, and there are "only a certain number of miles left in it," according to Dr. Palmer.

Clarence Campbell, the president of the National Hockey League, has suspended Tony White of the Washington Capitals for five games for throwing his stick at Mike Walton of Vancouver. Walton received a cut below the left eye. Campbell said, "White took a terrible risk in throwing his stick, and it is fortunate that the injury to Walton was not more serious."

Morris Blackwell, a wide receiver for Wayne State University, does not hang around the campus after football practice as do most college players. He spends much of his free time in a dilapidated southwest Detroit apartment, caring for a 78-year-old blind man known as Leo. Blackwell heard about Leo four years ago and began visiting the man to take care of his two dogs.

Leo lies on a sofa he has not left in three years. Blackwell cleans, dresses and feeds him. "He has eaten more submarine sandwiches than anybody else in the world," said Blackwell of his patient. "I get him two every day. He really works them down."

Lying on his couch, Leo said, "He's really a good boy. He takes care of me . . . he's always here when I need him."

2 Starters Join Giant Injury List

By MICHAEL KATZ

Special to The New York Times
PLEASANTVILLE, N.Y., Nov. 12—Two more starters on the Giants' offensive team were injured today and their availability for Sunday's game against the Washington Redskins was not known.

Jimmy Robinson, a free agent who replaced Walker Gillette as a starting wide receiver this season, pulled a groin muscle in practice. The 5-foot-9-inch receiver had also sprained both ankles in last Sunday's 9-3 loss to the Dallas Cowboys. Doug Kotar, the Giants' leading rusher, was just recuperating from a thigh contusion in his left leg suffered in that game. He injured his right leg, below the knee, and left practice for X-rays. Gordon Bell would probably be Kotar's replacement at halfback.

"We'll just have to wait and see in the next two days," said Coach John McVay of the availability of Robinson and Kotar. The Giants, who have not scored a touchdown in 14 quarters, probably will be without Craig Morton at quarterback, Tom Muller at left tackle and Karl Chandler at center. Morton, who injured his elbow at Dallas, just handed off in practice today.

Morton hasn't thrown all week and McVay, asked if he would start a quarterback who hadn't been able to pass all week, said, "That's a very strong educated guess."

Thus, Norm Sneed should get the call Sunday at quarterback.

Mike Gibbons, who hasn't played at all this season except on the special teams, will probably start at left tackle. Mullen has a sprained ankle.

In addition, Bill Ellenbogen, a reserve guard, is not expected to play and Chandler, who has missed the last two games with a back injury, is doubtful. Chandler worked today, but said, "I don't know how I'll be when I hit someone." Ralph Hill is Chandler's replacement.

George Martin, a starting left defensive end, did not work out today because of a sprained ankle, but is expected to be ready Sunday.

Chichester Is Victor In Stakes at Toronto

Special to The New York Times

TORONTO, Nov. 12—Kevin Bacon, Australia's one-man team, rode Chichester to victory in the International Welcome Stakes today at the Royal Winter Fair horse show.

The event was the first of the international division in the 10-day show at the Coliseum. The Royal Winter Fair is the last stop on the North American fall indoor circuit.

The Welcome Stakes was a speed class, meaning there was no opportunity for a jumpoff. Chichester negotiated the course in faultless fashion in 50.6 seconds, by far the fastest of the field.

Eight horses were clean in the test, and second place went to Tuscaloosa, ridden by Dennis Murphy of the United States Equestrian Team in 53.1.

Glen Mischen, handied by the 36-year-old of the Belgium Equestrian Team, was third with a 55.7 clocking, and Grande, piloted by Mike Matz of the United States team, finished fourth in 56.3.

Frank Chapot, captain of the United States team, suffered a spill off Good Twist and withdrew from the class.

Giammona Earns La As Jets' Quick Return

By GERALD ESKENAZI

Louie Giammona was moaning, groaning and complaining. His wrist was encased in a cast that went halfway up his right arm. But that wasn't the trouble.

"How long is this going to take, Jeff?" he asked the Jets' trainer, Jeff Sneider.

"Four, five weeks, Louie."

"But, gosh, I just got to get better. I just got to."

Sneider relented. "Well," said the trainer, "maybe three weeks. You've got a break in there."

"I just gotta help this team out. I wanna do something for this team."

And Giammona puffed the air in frustration, walking out of the trainer's room, past the table labeled the "Jerome Barkum Memorial Training Table," and into the locker room.

"I just wish there were 42 others like him," said Sneider. "But I don't see how he can play."

The conversation between Giammona and Sneider took place five days ago. Tomorrow, Giammona will play against the Tampa Bay Buccaneers.

Football players often perform while wearing a cast on a wrist. But usually those are the tacklers. It is unusual when a receiver or runner plays with a cast.

Yet, Giammona will play as the New York Jets' punt-return and kickoff-return man against Tampa Bay, and it is an area in which the Jets sorely need him.

How well he can cradle a football with a broken wrist, and keep it jammed into his side so it isn't dislodged, will not be known until the game. He probably will carry the ball with his left hand.

What is known about Giammona, though, is that the 5-foot-9-inch, 180-pound rookie is one of the American Conference's best at taking kicks and running with them.

He is, in fact, the only threat the Jets have demonstrated on the punt-return game and is their best operative on returning kickoffs.

Following is a comparison of Giammona and everyone else:

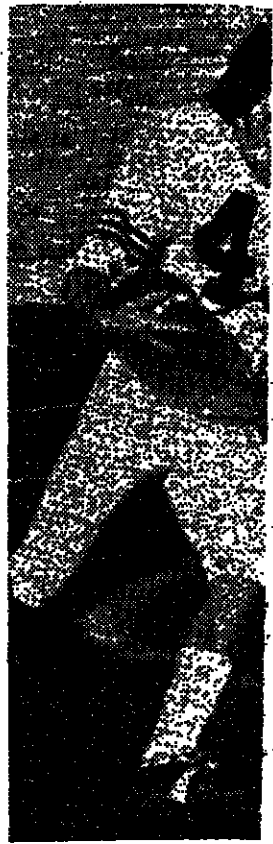

Player	PUNT RETURNS		KICKOFF RETURNS
	No.	Ave. Yds.	No.	Ave. Yds.
Giammona	10	10.9	25	25.1
Piccione	10	5	17	5

When Giammona was starting at Utah State, he handled the ball an average of more than 40 times a game—most of the time as a runner. In 1974 he led all rushers with 1,534 yards.

But the Jets don't want him to both rush and return kicks, so he has become a member of the special teams. That category has placed him seventh in the conference in punt returns (ahead of Houston's Billy (White Shoes) Johnson, and seventh in kickoff returns.

He has rushed only 18 times, averaging 3.3 yards. But when he is returning the ball, the New Yorkers have a better chance of getting it in a decent field-position situation.

Giammona is one of the young, enthusiastic Jets who have replaced the core of last year's squad. How long Giammona remains may have more to do with his ability to survive a constant special-teams pounding than his ability to play.

BEAUME DEFENDS USE OF HIDDEN SUBSIDIES

He Calls Construction Incentives a Nationwide Policy—Governor Has No Comment on Issue

By JOSEPH P. FRIED Mayor Beaume expressed serious reservations yesterday about the call by New York State's next Housing Commissioner for an end to "hidden subsidies"—such as tax abatements and tax-exempt construction bonds—that are designed to provide incentives for housing construction and other development projects. Such practices "have been matters of national policy and the Federal tax structure for at least 50 years," Mr. Beaume said. "Thus," he said, "if the city and state were to abandon these approaches unilaterally, it would put New York State and its construction and housing industries at a competitive disadvantage with other areas of the country."

A Personal View Mr. Heilmann, in a talk and an interview during a forum on financing urban needs, said that he was speaking personally, not on behalf of Governor Carey or his administration, and that he was not enunciating a specific new state policy. Nonetheless, because of his key position in the administration, Mr. Heilmann's views are taken as a possible reflection of the Governor's own approach in shaping policy. A spokesman for Mr. Carey said yesterday that the Governor had no comment to make on Mr. Heilmann's statements on the so-called hidden subsidies. The spokesman, James Vlasto, said Mr. Heilmann was regarded as "an important member of this administration—he's done an excellent job until now and will continue to do an excellent job where he's going."

Mr. Heilmann—appearing at a "Colloquium of Center City Reinvestment" held in Manhattan by the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials—said that tax relief, mortgage interest "differentiation" and similar benefits for housing and other developers had helped cause the New York State and City fiscal crises. He said that he believed that such "hidden subsidies" had "almost brought New York State to its knees and will do the same to the nation unless the practice is stopped now."

'Up-Front' Aid Urged He noted that he fully favored programs to rebuild declining areas of cities and to reverse eroding urban economies, but held that it would be better to finance such projects "up front"—that is, with Government appropriations or other means that permitted full and clear public knowledge of the total costs. The so-called hidden subsidy techniques, while fully legal because they were authorized in numerous Federal, State and local laws, did not permit such knowledge, he maintained. Mr. Heilmann touched on a key issue involved in the nation's attempt to solve major social and economic problems, such as providing needed housing for families of low and moderate incomes and other projects needed to spur economic revival. The issue is whether the tax structure should be arranged to provide developers and investors with added incentives to undertake such projects. Steps like property-tax abatements and income-tax deductions are needed as such added incentives, Albert A. Walsh, New York City's former Housing and Development administrator, said yesterday. Mr. Walsh, who is active in the association that sponsored the session at which Mr. Heilmann appeared, said that state officials' goal of "up-front" financing was "unrealizable in the short term if cities are going to be rebuilt."

Books of The Times Yes, We Have No Bananas

By STEVEN RATTNER AN AMERICAN COMPANY: THE TRAGEDY OF UNITED FRUIT. By Thomas McCann. 236 pages. Crown, $8.95. When Eli M. Black threw himself from the 44th floor of the Pan Am building on Feb. 3, 1975, the financial community was astonished. Mr. Black, a former rabbi turned millionaire businessman, had awed Wall Street in 1969 with his delicately engineered takeover of the multimillion-dollar United Fruit Company, and his suicide appeared unexplainable. In the days following Mr. Black's death, the financial press offered few clues. Some reports cited business pressures and explained that the company's earnings had recently turned into deficits, ostensibly due to unfavorable weather and unfriendly foreign governments. A perceptive few hinted that Mr. Black's operating genius was not equal to his financial wizardry and alluded to "disenchantment" within the company. Now Thomas McCann, a former vice president for public relations at United Fruit, has produced a fuller account and it is a remarkable tale of a complex man—vain, irrational, egotistical, insensitive—and what he hath wrought. In its halcyon days, United Fruit, despite its political activism abroad, had conducted its domestic affairs as a staid, traditional Boston company, innovating only grudgingly, but nonetheless, invariably producing respectable profits from its banana boats and Central American plantations.

Overpaid for Control Then Mr. Black arrived. Despite his reputed financial genius, Mr. Black had actually paid far more for United Fruit than it was worth, which overloaded it with debt and forced the sale of the most profitable subsidiaries. With little delay, the company's earnings, stock price and market share began deteriorating under his emotional, haphazard stewardship and soon even its most coveted possession, its spot as top banana producer, slipped away. A dozen key executives—many long-established—quit driven away by Mr. Black's peculiarities. At the time of his death, an insurrection was building among his closest aides. Until his end, Mr. Black appeared sanguine, always predicting that renewed profitability was just around the corner, but even his serenity proved illusory—Mr. McCann reveals that at his death, Mr. Black was seeing a psychiatrist and taking sleeping pills. Mr. McCann's heavily anecdotal narrative of the decline and death of Mr. Black is compelling, but with its un- McCann's background, does it represent a remarkable feat of investigative journalism. And, as with any insider book, the ingrown biases and dashed hopes of the author can't be ignored. Nonetheless, "The Tragedy of United Fruit" remains a very personal, very relevant, occasionally even poignant tale of the humanness of a seemingly inhuman corporate world.

Junkets Used as Ploy Because Mr. McCann was responsible for public relations, some of his least savory tales involve the press. Back in the 1950's, United Fruit's gambit was the junket: an all-expense-paid jaunt by a dozen reporters to Latin America for an inspection of United Fruit's operations—but only selected operations. In the more sophisticated 60's, Mr. McCann recalls—almost boastfully—how he carefully selected one prominent American newspaperman without business or Latin American background, gave him a "suggested" itinerary for a tour and received, in return, a front-page exaltation of United Fruit's ostensibly new-found social conscience. For a financial journalist, such anecdotes are a wrenching reminder of the continuing failure of the profession, particularly its inability to pierce the corporate veil and its tacit acceptance of the carefully manicured corporate image. Mr. McCann offers still more: Some thoughtful discussion of marketing reveals how United Fruit solved the problem of brand recognition by adding the distinctive "Chiquita" stickers to 1/2 billion per year—to attract shoppers. And the book touches on some of the frantic efforts to stimulate sales of the under-appreciated fruit by finding alternative uses for it; for example, as a freeze-dried addition to corn flakes. Actually, because this book tries to cover so much ground in its lightly written (and, just occasionally, confusing) pages, it is hardly a definitive business history of the quality of Anthony Sampson's exploration of the International Telephone & Telegraph Corporation. Nor, considering Mr. McCann's background, does it represent a remarkable feat of investigative journalism. And, as with any insider book, the ingrown biases and dashed hopes of the author can't be ignored. Nonetheless, "The Tragedy of United Fruit" remains a very personal, very relevant, occasionally even poignant tale of the humanness of a seemingly inhuman corporate world.

Burns vs. Carter?

In his testimony before the Senate Banking Committee this week, Chairman Arthur Burns of the Federal Reserve Board said he wanted to "cooperate" with the Carter Administration, but apparently only on his own terms. Indeed, his statement was interpreted as a warning to Mr. Carter that the Fed is prepared for a confrontation, if the new Administration seeks to promote a faster recovery by applying greater fiscal stimulus.

If this is a misreading of his intent, the blame is on Dr. Burns. For, in the carefully written part of his testimony, he said: "Traditional policies of economic stimulation might well be counterproductive. Fears of inflation would intensify and the seeds of another recession may be sown." That statement could readily be understood to represent the Fed's opposition to any effort to use fiscal and monetary policy to accelerate economic growth and reduce unemployment.

It seems highly unlikely that Dr. Burns meant to go that far; indeed, in other parts of his statement, he made clear that the Fed had "considerable room" to increase money-supply growth and that, if the economy sagged, monetary policy could and would be made more expansive than it currently is. The Fed's policy, Dr. Burns said, "is not frozen in concrete."

Mr. Carter and his advisers have shown the same caution and flexibility as Dr. Burns, though they seem more worried about the economic outlook than he does. In fact, during the election campaign, when President Ford was promising another big tax cut in 1977, Mr. Carter said that, while he would not rule out a tax cut in 1977, he preferred to wait and see how the budgetary and economic situation developed, before committing himself. In addition, Mr. Carter has set a target of budgetary balance by the end of his first term, and has stressed over and over his aim of avoiding excessive spending and eliminating existing programs that are wasteful.

However, fiscal policy should not be paralyzed by fears of inflation, if the economy continues to grow sluggishly and high unemployment persists. Mr. Carter pledged actions to reduce unemployment if he were elected—and so did Mr. Ford, more and more as the campaign developed. There is a clear mandate for Mr. Carter to move against high unemployment.

Dr. Burns should have been more careful to prevent the impression that he was challenging that mandate, as he recognized yesterday in trying to soften his remarks. By suggesting that any fiscal stimulus would be inflationary, he may himself have contributed to the inflationary expectations, which he treats as a "given" instead of something that can be reduced by astute national leadership.

If a Fed chairman puts a chip on his shoulder, a newly elected President is likely to knock it off, with the Democrats in Congress egging him on. Such a fight would hurt both the White House and the Fed—and probably the national economy.

Mr. Carter should not respond in heat, and Dr. Burns should demonstrate that he genuinely regards cooperation as a two-way street. It is good that, having spoken rashly, he seems now to understand this—but it will still have to be translated into policy.

Help for Mr. Soares

It was inevitable that Portugal's first democratically-elected Government in half a century would have to cope simultaneously with two burdens: tidying up after more than two years of wildly erratic and costly efforts at social and economic reform, much of it dictated by the Communist Party and its allies; and laying a foundation for Portugal's long-term political and economic regeneration and modernization.

Prime Minister Mario Soares has now resolutely tackled one task critical for both the long and the short run: overhaul of the drastic land distribution program launched in 1975. Rural workers seized hundreds of thousands of acres with the encouragement of a Communist-dominated interim Government, which "legalized" the occupations. Mr. Soares has now replaced a left-wing Socialist Agriculture Minister opposed to moderating the program.

Mr. Soares won decisive support for his pragmatic and gradualist policies from the Socialist Party Congress, promising to continue the agricultural reform program while correcting its "excesses and abuses." But a left-wing faction opposing moderation in farm policy, as well as Government actions to restore factory discipline and impose wage restraint, managed to win nearly a fourth of the seats on the party's national commission. This display of left-wing disaffection from the Government points up one of Mr. Soares's constant problems.

In the elections last April, the Socialists emerged as the biggest party but captured only 106 of 263 seats in the National Assembly. Prime Minister Soares nonetheless chose to form a minority Government, rather than trying for a coalition with the Popular Democrats, who finished second and subsequently changed their name to the Social Democratic Party. The Social Democrats have considerably more affinity with Mr. Soares's present course than does his own Socialist left wing.

The name change ought to make easier a coalition between these two left-of-center reform parties; and this tandem could have a better chance of winning a majority in the National Assembly. It could also help in staggering economic growth and employment.

cratic system for which both men fought courageously through the Salazar and Caetano dictatorships, they should find it possible to make the effort.

Young Criminals

The recent rash of muggings, robberies and violence committed by youths against old and infirm victims is a reflection of the brutalization of urban society. It also underscores the need for changes in the judicial system's approach to youthful offenders.

Old people throughout the city, but particularly in its poor sections, live in constant terror. To cowardly young thugs, they are not human beings in need of respect and assistance but targets to be harassed, robbed, injured and even killed, usually for the price of a few dollars. Symbolic of such urban decadence are the two boys, aged 12 and 14, who knocked down a frail 103-year-old woman on her way home from a supermarket in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, stealing from her a bag of groceries worth less than $2.

Even more shocking is the case against a 17-year-old youth in Queens who, having been released in his parents' custody after allegedly robbing an elderly woman in her Queens home, was subsequently arraigned on charges of having returned to his victim's house to set it on fire.

What makes that case significant is that the youth's previous record of law-breaking was routinely closed to the judge who released him. Under existing laws, any record of past trouble committed by offenders below the age of 16, even violent crimes, remain sealed in Family Court. While such records should of course be withheld from the public, serious consideration ought to be given to changes in the law that would allow judges to examine such files. The protection of the public safety requires that judges be fully apprised of past antisocial actions by those who stand accused of crimes that jeopardize the peace and security of the community.

The police, through its alert anticrime unit, has moved effectively in recent weeks to protect the elderly against young hoodlums who undoubtedly have stepped up their lawless activities in direct proportion to reports of successful forays by other youthful prowlers; news of vigorous police action, followed by swift trial and appropriate punishment, might do much to halt the alarming epidemic and to make the streets safe for the old who have every right to demand such safety.

Newer Landmarks

One of the most unwanted honors—to the real estate community and many building owners—is landmark designation. And one of the gestures made to investors by the drafters of the city's landmarks law was to make buildings less than 30 years old ineligible for designation. The idea was to keep New York's newer and larger structures completely negotiable, a kind of tradeoff for support of the law, which imposes severe limitations on the disposition of landmarks. A more philosophical argument was that it took time to know the architectural gems from the duds.

Now, in a sudden switch, owners of buildings less than 30 years old are requesting designation, which would require a change in the law. This surprising reversal has been brought about in part by the recent Federal tax reforms, which give the same tax breaks for the renovation of an older or landmark commercial property as for new construction. In addition, the Seagram Building's owners have asked for landmark status—a distinction that 18-year-old masterwork surely deserves.

The proposal would accord these newer buildings designation on a "voluntary" basis, or only at the request of their owners. The fear seems to be that if the Landmarks Commission were given the power to list any building, regardless of age, and allowed to designate at its own discretion, it would rush off on such a mass designation spree that it might endanger the economic viability of the city's most active and valuable property.

That is nonsense; the commission's procedures have been marked by notable realism and caution, with preference always given to owners' requests. It treats carefully where designation is opposed.

By holding any of the commission's actions to "voluntary" submissions, the city's right to designate according to its own professional standards would be compromised, both legally and in principle. There is no magic about the 30-year figure, and there is no cutoff point for superior architectural or environmental quality. The arbitrary time limitation ought to be lifted.

Productivity Rewards

Despite the fiscal crunch, we enthusiastically endorse the proposal of a panel of independent management experts that the city give wage increases to a score or more of supervisors in the Fire and Highways Departments who are credited with effecting dramatic improvement in the efficiency of their units.

Such bonuses for effective managers offer an appropriate counterpart to the cost-of-living increases that have been offered to regular municipal employees in return for productivity increases. The only caveat in both cases is that savings to the city must be real and measurable.

Although austerities imposed by an unprecedented fiscal crisis have compelled New York to impose temporary ceilings on the payroll, the city's long-term aim should be to maintain generous levels of remuneration for all of its employees, at the same time insisting on high performance in return. Lower labor costs—which the city must achieve—and low wages need not go hand in hand. Higher productivity can make the difference.

Letters to the Editor

Of School Safety and Pupil Suspension

To the Editor:
It is regrettable that you did not consult with our member principals before reaching your Nov. 3 editorial conclusions regarding the recent increase in pupil suspensions.

You assume that "penalties are capriciously applied" and "due process is violated." However, principals are prepared to document each suspension on the basis of your own criterion: "The schools' safety must be protected; teachers as well as fellow-students are entitled to demand the removal of dangerous or seriously disruptive youngsters."

With regard to truancy and cutting of classes, suspension is utilized when it is the only way to reach parents, without whose cooperation there is little hope for correction.

I agree with you that "... the board should look for effective means of protecting safety and upholding discipline by better methods than merely removing troublemakers from school." Our principals accept their responsibility, but only within the limitations of a drastically reduced educational budget and the circumscribed influence of the school on a student's conduct.

Principals must protect children's rights: They have a professional obligation to protect teachers who want to teach and children who want to learn.

PETER S. O'BRIEN
President, Council of Supervisors and Administrators
Brooklyn, Nov. 4, 1976

To the Editor:
In your editorial on "Excessive Suspensions" (Nov. 3), you deplore the increase in pupil suspensions in New York City schools and call for "better means of protecting safety and upholding discipline than merely removing troublemakers from school."

The 1969 bylaw on pupil suspensions, widely regarded as a model of fairness, recognized that the schools had a responsibility to take all possible steps to prevent the suspension of students. The circular stated: "All possible alternatives should be explored to help children resolve their adjustment problems before suspension is considered. . . . The approach should be supportive. Each principal and teacher has a responsibility to identify pupils in need of help and to enlist the aid of the Board of Education's pupil personnel services as well as the resources available in the community."

The removal of this kind of support is directly related to the marked increase in suspensions. During the past two years pupil personnel services have been decimated: Hundreds of guidance counselors, psychologists, social workers and attendance teachers have been laid off in the wake of massive budget cuts. In a recent survey, principals in every borough attributed the increase in suspensions to the loss of these services. If no one is available to analyze the causes of the disruptive behavior, contact the family, make the necessary referral for clinical services and follow up with needed measures in the school, how can the school provide the ounce of prevention that will obviate the pound of cure?

In this survey, a principal who lost his guidance services wrote: "This year we had more pre-suspension hearings than in the past five years. Intervention by the guidance counselor earlier might have prevented the escalation of events which resulted in student suspensions. Individual supportive counseling to students and parents has been severely curtailed."

Your call for more effective methods of coping with pupil suspensions is thoroughly justified. The way to do it is to provide adequate funding for the New York City schools so that they can restore their pupil personnel services.

In McCarthy's Defense

To the Editor:
Anthony Lewis' reference (Nov. 4) to Eugene McCarthy as a "spoiled child," and his statement that it would be a "special blessing" if McCarthy vanished from the political scene as a result of the 1976 election, fit into the sad pattern of conduct that has been displayed by various liberals throughout the postwar era.

One of the most disheartening lessons of the (Joseph) McCarthy era was that when liberals decide to throw in with the political mainstream, whatever it may be at the time, they reserve a special viciousness for their erstwhile comrades who decline to do so. In the recent election campaign, Eugene McCarthy effectively pointed out Jimmy Carter's shortcomings as a Democratic candidate, as well as those in his political record. The McCarthy candidacy, where the grace of the state and of the media permitted it to present itself, served as a legitimate vehicle for those who had been alienated by Carter's conduct and style in the primaries and were dissatisfied with the outcome of the nominating process.

There is something distinctly illiberal in the suggestion that independent candidates should remove themselves from contention where they have a chance of altering the outcome of the election. However, should Mr. Lewis decide to anoint a future candidate as the one around whom all must rally, he should do so well before the election so all others will be on notice that they risk being recorded as the "spoiled children" of that particular election year.

The Futile 'Trick'

To the Editor:
In the wake of the Conservative Party's eleventh-hour effort to deprive Mr. Moynihan of the Liberal Party label, the voting patterns of the Buckley-Moynihan contest provide one of the ironies of the campaign between the two men. Mr. Moynihan ended up receiving more votes on the Democratic Party line alone than Mr. Buckley obtained on the Republican and Conservative lines combined. So much for the intended effect of the Conservatives' last-minute campaign "dirty trick."

Child Support Program: 'It Is Working'

To the Editor:
On Oct. 8, an article on child support by Alvin L. Schorr appeared on the Op-Ed page of The Times. Using unidentified sources and misleading statistics, Mr. Schorr attempted to prove that the new Federal and state child support enforcement program has not been, and will not be, cost-effective. However, he did not succeed in proving his case.

At the outset, Mr. Schorr cited "a study performed by a consultant firm" as the only available evidence on collection figures for the new program. He overlooked a recent and far more complete report published by H.E.W.'s Office of Child Support Enforcement. After calling the Arthur Young report a study of the five most successful child-support programs in the country, Mr. Schorr offered some dismal figures from New York State which were not included in the report. Mr. Schorr demonstrated his highly parochial attitude by not recognizing that most states do a far better job of managing their fiscal affairs than does New York.

In contrast, it is worthwhile to look at dollar receipts in Sacramento County, California. Last year the District Attorney's office, which operates the program there, spent $2.4 million on child-support enforcement and was able to collect $8.4 million. Even during the 1973-74 period, when recession set in and unemployment rose dramatically, collections in Sacramento County rose by $1.8 million.

Another state commented upon in the article is Michigan. Mr. Schorr misled the reader by mentioning that state and then citing one inaccurate and one incomplete figure on nationwide expenditures and collections. A check with David Bailey at the Michigan Department of Social Services revealed that in the past year $3.3 million has been spent to collect $63 million in Michigan.

Finally, Mr. Schorr raises the issue of responsibility. He asserts that "the fundamental problem is to obtain broad agreement on the degree to which a remarried father is responsible for children by his first wife."

A child's rights are absolute and cannot be abrogated by a father who wishes to desert one family and begin another. The Federal Child Support Enforcement Program is an attempt to make fathers shoulder their rightful share of the financial burden of a child's upbringing, rather than passing it on to the taxpayer. And it is working.

San Francisco Area Rapid Transit—a 'Disappointing' Model

Irvin M. Webber

BERKELEY, CALIF. — Behind the San Francisco Area Rapid Transit system is the automobile. By offering high-style and down-style, BART was to entice suburban business districts to downtown. By making downtown more to be and suburbs were to be around rail stations, as expected, BART other cities how to deal with the metropolitan problem, central-city urban sprawl. If it did the Bay Area, perhaps the in the country, other areas would be fore- search elsewhere for an-is still not fully opera- mostly to equipment the absence of weekend can now ask how well g. It is important we do eight metropolitan areas ning to install BART-like two others are in con-results are disappointing.

Having spent $1.6 billion to reverse the trend of the auto-highway system, BART has attracted only half the passengers expected and is serving a mere 2 percent of trips within its district. Less than a third of its riders were diverted from private cars; about half came from car pools and buses. Space on the highways left by travelers diverted to BART was quickly filled by other motorists; perversely, BART has made it possible to use autos more freely. As a result, traffic congestion is about the same.

BART is far more expensive than anyone expected. It was supposed to have enjoyed an $11 million operating surplus this past year, instead it ran a $40 million deficit. High operating costs (about 475 percent of those forecast) plus high capital costs (about 150 percent of those forecast) are being compounded by low patronage (50 percent of that forecast) to make for average costs per ride that are twice as high as the bus and 50 percent greater than a standard American car.

Costs of a commuter trip from suburban Orinda to San Francisco's financial district illustrate the scale of the extravagance. Even biasing the estimates to make BART appear most competitive with buses and cars, full social costs, as economists would compute them, of a ride on BART are $6.77. On the same basis, a bus ride costs $3.21. Even a big American sedan is cheaper than BART—$4.49, all public and private costs included.

The 50,000 passengers BART diverted from buses could be carried in new luxury buses at a capital investment of under $13 million. The Bay Area could buy a fleet of new buses sufficient to carry all BART's passengers projected to 1980 for less than $40 million, or about half of one year's worth of BART's mortgage payments alone.

Perhaps the cost would be worth it had BART generated the expected metropolitan trends. Unfortunately, the overall effect on development so far has been modest at best. It may have contributed to the "Manhattanization" of San Francisco's skyline, but so far it has had nearly zero effect in suburban areas.

Because BART is supported by property and sales taxes, its revenues are disproportionately drawn from low-income households. Its riders are mostly drawn from middle- and upper-income households. The poor are paying and the rich are riding.

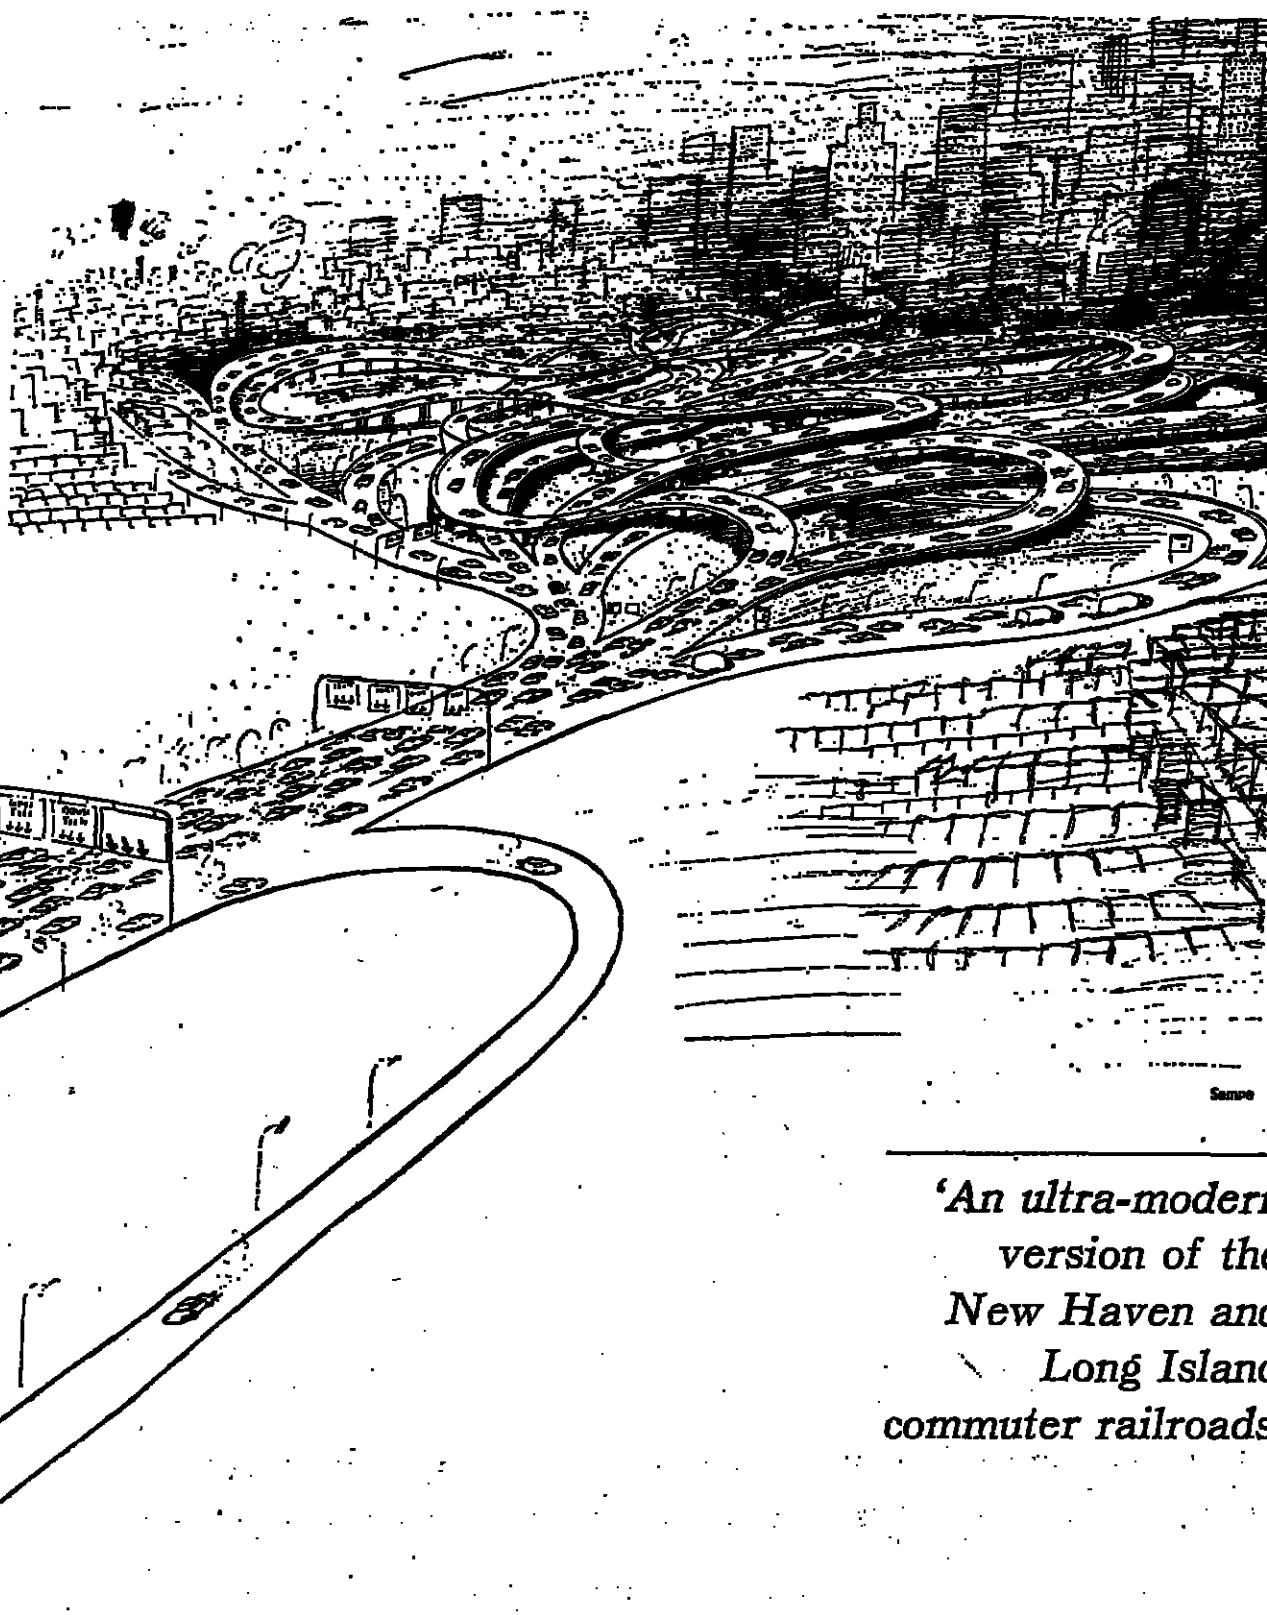

In retrospect, it seems BART planners made a fundamental mistake at the outset by selecting fixed-rail technology. Recent research shows that commuters' inner "anxiety meters" tick three times faster while getting from home to a moving vehicle than they do while riding on the long leg of the trip.

BART's designers assumed that commuters choose private cars because of their high speed and so, at great expense, they built in capabilities for 80-mile-per-hour service. It now turns out that it's the door-to-door, no-wait, no-transfer features of the automobile that matter most to commuters, instead. Having traded away easy access for high speed, BART now finds itself too far removed from people's houses. Would-be BART riders, therefore, prefer using either buses that come close to their houses or their private cars parked out front. The paradox of the Bay Area Rapid Transit system is that it is too rapid.

Although BART was to have outdone the automobile on its own terms, instead it became an ultra-modern version of the New Haven and Long Island commuter railroads — not the first of a new breed of urban transport, but perhaps the last of a dying species.

'An ultra-modern version of the New Haven and Long Island commuter railroads'

Webber is professor of city director of the Institute of Regional Development, University of California, Berkeley, from an article in 'The Public Interest.'

HAMDEN, CONN.

For us who live on Mill Rock in the town of Hamden, it's hard to walk up the hill past Thornton Wilder's house, knowing that the study with the casement window is empty. In years to come, biographers will try to recreate Thornton's personality; scholars will analyze his books and plays; readers may accord him immortality. But for us who were his neighbors, the real person, the lively, affectionate, unpretentious man is gone.

Barely a hundred yards of steep road separate my house from the one in which Thornton made his home with his sister Isabel. "The House the Bridge Built," their mother called it because, fifty years ago, the success of "The Bridge of San Luis Rey" enabled Thornton to build it for his parents. He loved it, but he couldn't always work there. Intruded upon by admirers, he fled to remote places, choosing those that offered relaxation when what he referred to as his "daily stint" was done.

Then, one day, we'd see the old Chrysler or the Thunderbird or the Mustang coming up the hill again. Thornton was home. The neighbors would be asked in. Mrs. Wilder and Isabel presided over food and libation. Thornton the storyteller, the engaging ban, would stand before the fireplace, talking at top speed though never rapidly enough to catch up with his seat. Hearing him laugh at his own jokes, one was reminded of a small boy. Summer evenings we went out on the terrace overlooking New Haven, and watched the sunset cast an Alpine glow on the sheer face of East Rock. "Our Dolomite," Thornton called it.

He needed his friends the way he needed the truck drivers he met in those diners where he liked to eat breakfast. We were his contact with the everyday world; his audience long before opening night, the readers who loved what he wrote even before he set it down on paper. But we weren't always on the inside. There were evenings while "The Sign of Our Teeth" was in production when he would come in, sit up and down the hill, from the top of our beds, we couldn't avoid overhearing the histrionics of Tallulah Bankhead. I remember the Halloween I went out with my children and found Thornton trying to calm his mother after pranksters had stolen her garbage can; the times he invited my daughter Ellen, who at 12 was already a good musician, to play Mozart sonatas with him. I can still see her pigtail bobbing as she trudged up the hill, carrying her violin case.

And that April day three and a half years ago, when I was working in my garden and Thornton stopped his car, getting out painfully, I thought, yet looking radiant. "The last chapter!" he announced happily, waving a manila envelope before my eyes. "And tomorrow, I'm going to be seventy-six."

He was on his way to the post office with the last chapter of "Theophilus North." "For some weeks I had felt intimations of autumn in the air," it begins.

This book, Thornton told me, was "just a splinter of a much longer one," adding, "Writing is, among other things, a habit and I expect to be back in harness very soon."

But he wrote no more. Earlier, he had sometimes signed his letters playfully, "Ever, Old Thort." Now he really was old. And ill. Yet he still looked forward, "You have the sense of forever beginning your career," he said. Then, a year ago Dec. 7, Thornton took the afternoon nap from which he never awoke.

The House the Bridge Built is passing out of the family. Some day, perhaps, those who cherish our literary tradition will acquire it for a national monument and invite the public in. Enchanted readers and eager writers will catch an echo-in-time of the voice we heard there. Entering the study, they will feel close to the genius that created "Our Town." Standing on the terrace, they will look over the city the way Thornton, with that detached involvement, looked over the world.

Just before the last chapter, Theophilus North confides: There were tears in my eyes. I am never so happy as when I'm inventing. . . . I said hesitantly, "I always find it hard to say goodbye." "So do I."

Daisy Newman has written a number of books. Her most recent, a novel, is "I Take Thee, Serenity."

Pistols In Their Book Bags

By C. L. Sulzberger

ANKARA, Turkey—Although the nationalist revolution here started more than half a century ago it has never gained sufficient headway. One result of this sad fact is a growing realization that Turkey is not yet economically qualified to join the European Community, much as it would like to do so for political reasons plus a recognition that mass social inequalities continue long after the death of Kemal Ataturk, father of the modern republic.

There is continual apologetic reference by its leaders to Turkey "as a developing country." This is, of course, true, but is nevertheless puzzling when one considers that it emerged from one of the world's great empires (the Ottoman) after the first great war and has a long, distinguished tradition of an educated elite.

Yet Turks resent the fact that even in terms of association with the E.E.C. they are disfavored as compared with former African colonies of France and Britain. Still, some of the latter, which were indeed once colonies of Turkey, are advancing more speedily than their ancient administrators.

One is often told that women in contemporary Turkey hold a very emancipated position for a Moslem country. This is plainly true. But it was true even before World War II. Ataturk also decreed total separation between church and state and banned religious intervention in political affairs.

Even at this moment one can visit backward Anatolian villages near Ankara where women dress as they did a century ago. And there is evidence of growing Islamic intrusion into certain political factions. Moreover, the same kind of violence is growing in the student body at universities that produced a few years ago the brink of anarchy and army intervention to restore order.

Last week, when the academic year began—tardily because of previous disorders—newspapers reported among other things: "Three students were apprehended for possession of handguns and three other guns were found with apparently no owners. The police also found sticks of dynamite during the search."

"Also in Istanbul six students carrying firearms were taken into custody. Four students suffered shot wounds today when armed clashes broke out. . . . The Gazi Educational Institute had more police officers parked in front than students . . . a police panzer waited near the gate, just in case."

The atmosphere is sufficiently uneasy to alarm both intellectual and business elements and to weaken governmental efforts to solve critical foreign policy problems like relations with the United States, relations with Greece, Cyprus. A national election will be held in eleven months and neither of the two main parties in the contest seems ready to agree to any settlement favored by the other—in the hope of fanning chauvinistic vote appeals.

Bulent Ecevit, former Prime Minister and leader of the opposition Republican People's Party (with 190 out of 400 deputies) told me: "From next March on there will be a heated political campaign. The main problem of Turkish politics is the irreconcilability of the two big parties. I can see no possibility of a strong, effective Government before the 1977 elections."

More than this, he accuses the Government of Prime Minister Demirel, head of the Justice Party (160 deputies) has in coalition with 46 National Salvationist rightists and four even further right-wingers, of encouraging student violence and ordering the police only to oppose left-wing extremists. Mr. Demirel, of course, vigorously denies this.

The widening rift seemingly excludes any chance of a national Government based on R.F.P.-Justice Party cooperation, which would represent almost nine-tenths of the voters and give Turkey a strong enough interim regime to face and solve pressing problems abroad that now poison relations between this vigorous nation and the West.

From an international viewpoint it would obviously be sensible for Messrs. Demirel and Ecevit to pool their governmental energies and speedily assuage a bad emotional resentment against America, provoked by the stupid United States Congressional arms embargo, and a relationship with Greece that sometimes verges on disaster.

Yet, while politicians here admit such a national coalition would be logical and give Ankara the cohesion needed to negotiate calmly with the stringently based Caramanlis administration in Athens and possibly also to cool off some of the emotional anti-Americanism growing among the masses, those same politicians exclude all chance of such a solution.

Instead theyicker privately about potential future collaboration with supernaturalistic minorities—should next year's vote produce another dead heat. And, in the meantime, students pack pistols in their book bags.

Notes on People

Dr. Glenn Olds, the educator who was called in to restore tranquility at Kent State University after the shootings in 1970 in which National Guardsmen killed four students, resigned Thursday night, but the university trustees rejected his resignation. Dr. Olds, who took over as president in 1971, told the trustees in a long letter that the "tasks of healing and restoration" had been completed. Dr. Olds said his decision had not been easy, but that "nothing about my tenure at Kent State from the day I arrived has been easy." Advances had been made, he said, despite "the tragedy of 1970," loss of funding to higher education in Ohio, a reduced enrollment and a close faculty vote in favor of unionization. The trustees, in rejecting the president's resignation, apparently were opening the door to a renegotiation of his contract.

An estimated 200 former members of Congress from more than 30 states are expected to honor Sam J. Ervin Jr., the former Democratic Senator from North Carolina, at a dinner tonight in Colonial Williamsburg, Va. Mr. Ervin, who capped his long political career by acting as chairman of the Watergate investigating committee, will receive the Distinguished Service Award of Former Members of Congress.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy and his nephew Joseph, son of the late Senator Robert F. Kennedy, had a private audience with Pope Paul VI in Vatican City yesterday. Earlier in the day, the Senator conferred with Benigno Zaccagnini, political secretary of the ruling Christian Democratic Party, and last night he was scheduled to meet with Italian Communist leaders.

Antoinette Slovik, the widow of Pvt. Eddie Slovik, the only American to be executed for desertion in World War II, is trying to have her husband's court-martial sentence voided so that she may collect the principal and interest on his $10,000 Government life insurance policy. Mrs. Slovik, now 63 years old, lives on welfare in a nursing home in Detroit. She is being aided by two lawyers and Edward Wood, a retired Army major who was appointed Private Slovik's defense counsel at his two-hour court-martial on Nov. 11, 1944. The young soldier was stripped of all veterans' benefits before his execution by a 12-man firing squad on Jan. 31, 1945. Major Wood and the lawyers will base their petition to the Army Board of Correction of Military Records, for a review and pardon, on a number of legal technicalities.

Ronald Reagan, the former actor and Governor of California, proved once again that he is not a fan of Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger. Asked in Las Vegas what he thought of the suggestion by Senator Abraham A. Ribicoff, the Democrat from Connecticut, that Mr. Kissinger be kept on by President-elect Jimmy Carter as a special Middle East envoy, Mr. Reagan said that "Mr. Ribicoff has more confidence in Mr. Kissinger than I do."

George Burns at "21" Club yesterday

George Burns, the octogenarian singer and sometime comic, was "Living It Up"—the title of his just-published autobiography—at a "21" Club luncheon yesterday and promoting his television special that will be seen on CBS Dec. 1. "My show follows Bing Crosby's," Mr. Burns said. "We have a deal. He doesn't sing 'Red Rose Rag' and I don't fool around with 'White Christmas.'" On passing the 80-year-old mark, Mr. Burns said: "I don't believe in getting old—that's for young people. But the nice thing about growing old is you can't get sick anymore—you've had everything." On lust and sex, Mr. Burns was philosophical as well as practical. "When you get to be my age, the idea is just to get out of bed," he said. Mr. Burns wound up the brief interview with his own question: "Isn't it nice to talk to me, an old Jew who knows everything?"

2 Men Assaulted By Band of Youths In East New York

Two men were assaulted with knives and chains in the East New York section of Brooklyn on Thursday evening by between 10 and 20 youths at the foot of the stairway of the elevated Van Sicken station of the IRT line, the police reported yesterday.

They said two transit police officers who had been stacked out at the change booth were also attacked and fired six shots at the youths, who fled.

According to the police, the band of youths attacked Edward Bonilla, 40 years old, of 2276 Creston Avenue, the Bronx, as he was on his way to visit his sister. After stabbing him in the face, the youths stole his attaché case containing a $165 money order and $45 in cash. The victim, who fled into a nearby grocery store, was treated and released at Brookdale Hospital.

When the attack was in progress, Jesse Smalls, 30, who lives in the neighborhood, at 593 Bradford Street, and was walking his small dog nearby, was pounced on by the youths, who slashed him on the face and beat him with chains. Whether Mr. Smalls attempted to intercede in the robbery was unclear, the police said. He was admitted to Brookdale Hospital in stable condition.

The two transit police officers in civilian clothes were notified of the robbery and descended the stairs, and they were then attacked by the youths. Officer Ramon Collazo, who was knifed in the wrist, fired five shots, and his partner, Officer John McMillan, fired one shot at the youths.

West German Rich: Hard Work and a Bit of Luck

By CRAIG R. WHITNEY

REGENSBURG, West Germany — Some of them have always had it. Some of them lost all of it in World War II but have made it back again. Some of them have acquired it only recently. All of them have trouble keeping it.

They are the West Germans with wealth. They have acquired and preserved it by a combination of hard work, a bit of luck and a conservative approach to business and politics.

Some of the same families that were rich before the Nazis came to power in the early 1930's are rich again. Others owe their wealth to the postwar "economic miracle," their fortunes built in such new enterprises as mail-order houses, textiles and electronics. Whatever the source, the wealthy—among them 20,000 Deutschmark millionaires, worth $400,000 or more—are less an elite social class than an expression of the economic health of the country.

Some Inherited, Some Created

Per capita income is the fourth highest in the world, behind only the United States, Sweden and Switzerland. The average industrial worker makes about $4.50 an hour, not much less than the American average. The poorest third of the population of 57 million get 11 percent of personal income in the United States; the figure is 8 percent, according to a recent study published in Paris.

Some of the millionaires inherited their money, an example being Prince Johannes von Thurn und Taxis, who lives on the top floor of a huge castle—with its own Roman Catholic chapel and a glittering mirrored ballroom—in this eastern Bavarian city. Others created theirs out of nothing—like Alfred C. Toepfer, an 82-year-old businessman in Hamburg who works 12 hour days and does not have cushions on the plain oak furniture of his modest office.

Some have had to defend their wealth, among them Hans Gerling, a cool, elegant insurance magnate in Cologne who nearly lost his family enterprise after a bank failed two years ago. Others have moved up the economic and social scale only since the war, displacing the self-perpetuating dynasties of the past—people like Axel Springer, sole owner of West Germany's largest publishing empire, who jets between his villas in West Berlin, Hamburg and Switzerland and whose newspapers, book-publishing houses and distribution enterprises took in $500 million last year.

Nearly all the rich of West Germany went to ordinary public schools, and they send their children to such schools. Money is not a common subject of conversation; indeed, the Germans, wealthy or not, prefer such euphemisms as "means" or "substance."

What sets the rich off from the middle class in a rich country is the dimensions of their existence. Their homes are spacious villas instead of efficient apartments. Their ski resorts are in Switzerland instead of Austria. Their summer cottages are on islands in the North Sea or the shores of Lake Constance, not on garden plots at the outskirts of town.

While a few like to show off their wealth, some act ashamed of it and all are defensive and cautious, anxious not to lose what they have attained.

The West Germans are becoming more conservative—that is the way they are voting—and less eager for change in their lives than they were, say, 10 years ago. Wealth and the traditional virtue of hard work seem to go together still, even for the richest among them.

One of the richest is Prince Johannes von Thurn und Taxis, who is also one of those who have always had their wealth. "I have my art. I don't collect it," he said. "Some people collect Renoirs. I surround myself with ancestors."

Once They Were Robber Barons

The feudal and anachronistic castle his family has lived in since 1790 dominates the unspoiled city of Regensburg. The kitchen still feeds 320 needy students and charity cases every noon while the Prince dines on the third floor, a gloved steward at attention.

A 50-year-old bachelor, the Prince lives in his castle apartments eight months of the year. The rest of the time is largely devoted to yachting at a castle near Munich—a place inherited from his great-grandmother.

"We," the Prince said, meaning his family, "invented the mail and got the monopoly on mail service for the Holy Roman Empire in the 15th century. Before that we were robber barons, pirates really, in northern Italy." The em-

In the opinion of d Lund, the Adelphi, re- who is studying the sharks, ral weeks during each of the summers Dr. Lund has a crew of students in Bear taking out slabs of the sharp- soft limestone and splitting ok for skeletons embedded

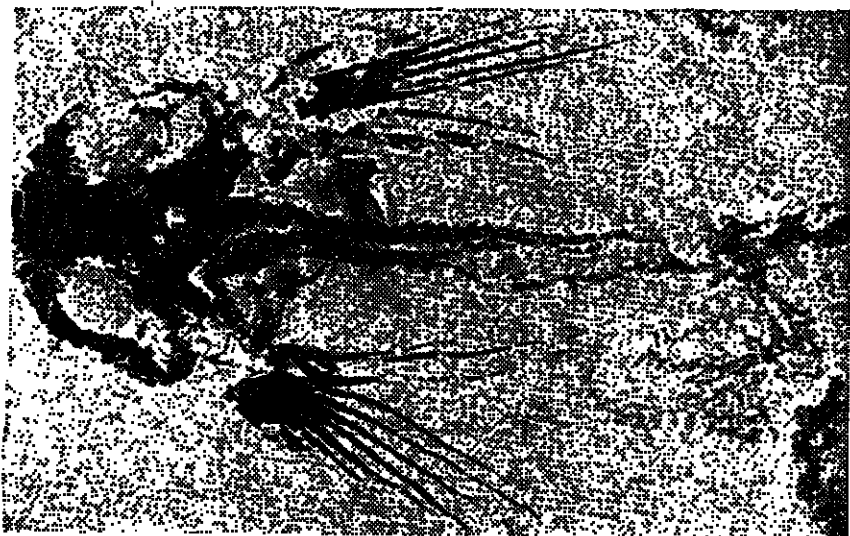

Dr. Lund said that every second or third slab contained a skeleton and that the work thus far had yielded 64 species of shark. Many previously unknown. Because of the large number of preserved skeletons, Dr. Lund believes there was rapid sedimentation in the ancient sea, quickly burying dead fish before they could be broken up. Some of the sharks are so well preserved that the remains of shrimp can be found in their stomachs.

Bear Gulch lies in the midst of what was once a shallow, warm sea that stretched across western North America for 600 miles during the period in geologic time known as the Mississippian, which lasted from 360 million to 320 million years ago. This was a time within the larger period known as the Carboniferous.

"In their eons of diversification, sharks have been everything from slow, harmless cruisers to rapacious carnivores," Dr. Lund said in his laboratory on the Adelphi campus in Garden City before flying to Boulder, Colo., to describe his findings before the Society of Vertebrate Paleontology. "Their experiments have been very successful. They have done anything any fish can do."

From the fossils it appears that sharks, which have skeletons of cartilage rather than bone, were the first form of fish to evolve adaptations to a wide variety of life-styles. Millions of years later, as the more advanced bony fish evolved, they adapted to the same variety of ecological niches and, competing successfully with the sharks, drove most of them to extinction.

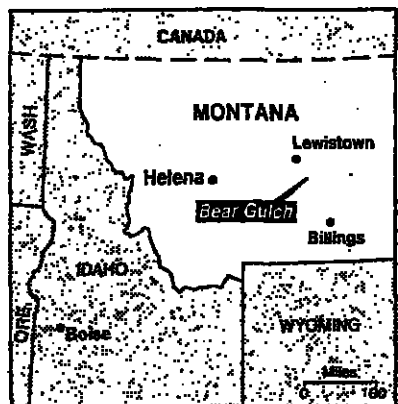

Before the rise of the bony fishes, however, half of all the known species of fish were varieties of shark. In addition to yielding sharks, Bear Gulch has yielded shrimps, worms and many other as yet unidentified forms of animals. In many cases the sediments preserved not just skeletons and other hard parts but the outlines of the soft parts of bodies such as gill filaments. In many of the fish, the scales were preserved in their original patterns over the skin.

Among the bony fishes found at Bear Gulch are five different kinds of coelacanth, the 450 million-year-old species of fish thought to have been extinct until a living specimen was captured and identified in 1938.

Much of Dr. Lund's work at Bear Gulch has been supported by the National Science Foundation and carried out in cooperation with one of the few other experts on fish paleontology, Dr. William Melton of the University of Montana. When asked how many fish paleontologists there were, Dr. Lund thought a moment and replied, "Four."

Dr. Richard Lund uses a drawing to describe a shark with a hinged dorsal fin he discovered at Bear Gulch, Mont. Above the map is a picture of another prehistoric shark found at the western site.

Government spending for the coming 1978 fiscal year is expected to approach or exceed $450 billion, even if the Carter administration proposes no new programs. The estimate was made by the Ford Administration, which said that the projected rise in outlays would amount to about 10 percent. The budget document, required by law, said that the deficit for the present fiscal year could rise to $59.3 billion. [1:1.]

The United Parcel Service and the teamsters union, informed sources said, have agreed on the basic terms for ending an eight-week strike by warehousemen and deliverers in 15 Eastern States. Announcement of a settlement was reported to be awaiting completion of specific contract language and discussion of the proposed terms with local union officers. Operations may resume by the middle of next week. [1:2.]

A storm of protest rose in Mobile, Ala., over a Federal court ruling ordering the city to replace its present city government with one more favorable to blacks. A group distributed petitions to implore the judge who issued the order after concluding that the city commission, with each of its three members elected by citywide vote, "precludes a black voter from an effective participation in the election system." He ordered that a mayor be chosen by citywide vote and nine council members elected from different districts. [1:1-2.]

Suspending collective bargaining for municipal employees during New York City's fiscal crisis was urged by Albert Shanker, president of the United Federation of Teachers, in suggesting the radical departure from usual labor policy. Mr. Shanker said that "maintaining a conventional, seasonal posture in a reriod of a combination of war and bankruptcy is ridiculous." He has spent 14 months trying to negotiate a contract that was believed settled after his union struck the city's schools. [1:3.]

A key witness who testified for the prosecution 10 years ago at the first murder trial of Rubin (Hurricane) Carter gave new and possibly more-damaging testimony at the second trial of Mr. Carter and John Artis. The witness testified for the first time that, hours after three persons had been killed, the police showed her a cartridge and a shotgun shell they said they had just found in the car in which the two men were arrested. [2:1-2.]

In a major narcotics trial, 17 persons were convicted and four were acquitted of conspiracy in the importation and selling of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of cocaine and heroin. A Federal jury in Manhattan had deliberated six days in the three-month trial. [4:1-3.]

Business/Finance

The nation's economic recovery is proceeding more slowly than was predicted by the Ford Administration, according to Alan Greenspan, the President's chief economic adviser. In an interview, Mr. Greenspan acknowledged that the economy was still in a "pause" that was lasting longer than expected but that it would end. [2:5-6.]

Seeking to clarify an issue, Arthur F. Burns, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, said he expected to be able to cooperate with President-elect Carter's economic policies. [2:6.]

Japan's economy will be stimulated by a program adopted by the Tokyo Government, which faces nationwide elections Dec. 5. The effort to speed the slow pace of economic recovery calls for spending $3.45 billion in public works, private housing and more financing for smaller businesses. [2:3-4.]

Recover $500,000 in Art; But Bag Also Reported Stolen

By ALFRED E. CLARK

Work of art valued at more than $500,000, including paintings by Miró and Duchamp, were recovered by police yesterday. Two men were arrested on charges of criminal possession of stolen property, and a third man was arrested on charges of possession of stolen property. The paintings, lithographs and ink drawings, valued at $500,000, were stolen Oct. 25 from the home of Robert Elkon, an art dealer, at 18 East 81st Street. Police are still looking for the man who was later identified as Mr. Bigi. Bigi allegedly called Mr. Elkon and said that "for a price I might be able to lay my hands on the paintings."

Then "as an act of good faith," one of the paintings was returned to Mr. Elkon in an unknown manner. Detective Sgt. Robert Gibbons said that on Nov. 11 Mr. Elkon gave Mr. Bigi $30,000 to see if Mr. Bigi could contact those who had the paintings.

A surveillance by Detectives Bruce Frankel, Ben Jacobson and Donald O'Sullivan led to the arrest Thursday night of Mr. Casierforte at First Avenue and 86th Street. The police said he was taking a Jackson Pollock out of the car and bringing it into a restaurant.

Mr. Bigi later was arrested at his home, and the police said the $30,000 was retrieved intact.

Bank Plans to Build Tower

By E. TOMASSON

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York announced today that it had abandoned plans to build a 42-story office building at the bank's headquarters in the Financial District.

The bank's president, John J. McManus, said that the plan to build was dictated by the Federal Reserve System's decision to build a new building at 200 Nassau Street.

The plan for the 42-story building was approved by the City Planning Commission last month. The building would have been a landmark addition to the Financial District.

The bank's new building at 200 Nassau Street is a slender, rectangular structure with four steel columns. It is located on the corner of Nassau Street and John Street.

Beame Set to Leave For Israel and Rome

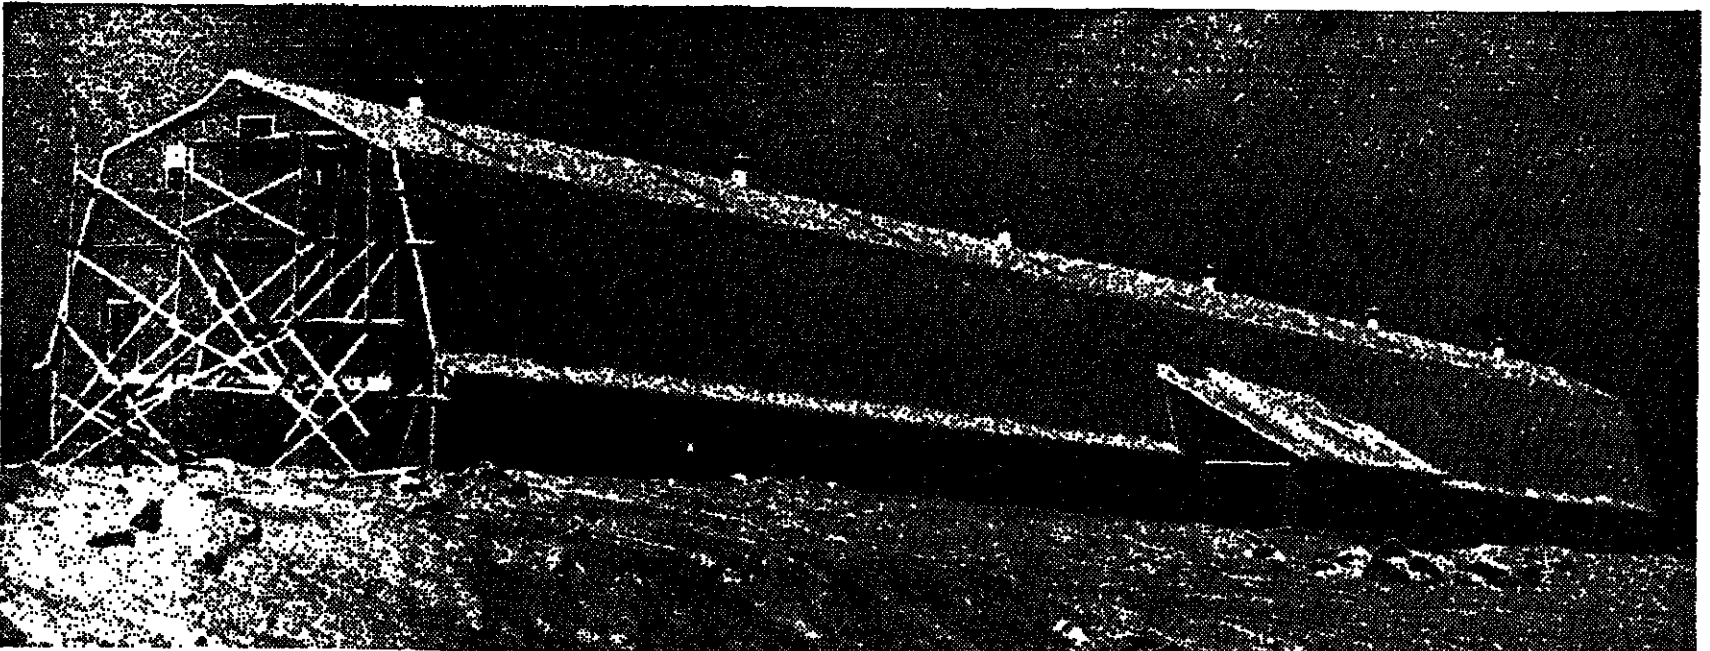

Mayor Beame is scheduled to leave tonight for a 10-day visit to Israel and a stopover in Rome for a private audience with Pope Paul VI—the first trip to Europe.

The 70-year-old Mayor is traveling with a 16-member delegation from the United States Conference of Mayors to study what Mr. Beame's office said was "Israeli approaches to various urban problems."

The Israel trip had been scheduled for some time, but Mr. Beame's office was able to arrange an audience with Pope Paul only in the last week. The stopover means that the Mayor will have finally taken in two of the so-called "three I's" that are deemed mandatory for any mayor or mayoral aspirant of New York City: Israel, Italy and Ireland.

He will be joined by Mrs. Beame and Sidney J. Frigand, his press secretary.

Mr. Beame, who was born in London and who came with his family to the lower East Side before the age of 1, was asked recently when was the last time he had been to Europe. "Nineteen hundred and . . ." the Mayor said, pausing, ". . . and six."

A dairy barn, 430 feet long, being constructed on a farm in Boonville, N.Y., some 25 miles north of Utica, by the farm's Iranian owners

Iranians Are Erecting 430-Foot Barn Near Utica, Stirring Some Rumors of International Intrigue

By DAVID BIRD

BOONVILLE, N.Y., Nov. 12—The Iranian owners of a 420-acre farm outside this Oneida County village are putting up what may be the biggest dairy barn in the Northeast, but many people hereabouts say there is something mysterious about the thing.

It is 430 feet long, nearly half again as big as a football field, and its white roof sits just off Route 12 like an enormous, low-hanging cloud.

There are no indications that it will be used for anything other than the stated intentions of the owners—to house 300 cows comfortably and economically.

But this normally placid village of 2,500 lately has been stirred with growing rumors—from talk that the barn may eventually harbor camels to wilder speculation about international intrigue involving the Iranian secret police.

Local businessmen have tried to put down the speculation. They view the barn and its owners as a big help to the sagging local economy, both in the construction and later in the dairy business. And they are afraid the rumors and publicity may frighten away the Iranian owners.

"What all the fuss about?" said Raymond Durr, a leading Boonville attorney who has represented the Iranians, when he is asked about the barn. "The size of the barn was enough in itself to draw interest."

"They had to be talking about it just because it was so big," Harland Lee, the contractor who was hired to build the barn, said the other day as he kicked the frozen mud around the building. "It's just like people talked when they built the Empire State Building."

through the barn on a visit the other day.

Mr. Tehrani and his wife and two children spent a year on the farm before the barn was built, but they have since moved down to suburban New Jersey because they felt the Boonville area was too cold and too isolated for full-time living.

Although Mr. Tehrani does not like to talk about how much the project is costing him, an associate said that $1.5 million would be spent in building the barn and in clearing the land around it for meadows.

Pharmacist in Iran

Mr. Tehrani, who is 37 years old, was a pharmacist in Iran but has been unable, he said, to find work here because of language difficulties and licensing requirements.

An associate, who asked that his name not be used, said that the money to build the barn and clear the land came from the sale of family land in Iran, which had rapidly appreciated in value recently.

In an area where the largest barns are less than half the size of Mr. Tehrani's there are those who say such a large operation is bound to be uneconomical.

Mr. Tehrani said that a large barn was the only way of making a profit in dairying now, and that smaller barns were inefficient and would stand no chance in an increasingly automated world.

He said that because the 200 cows he plans to keep in the barn would all be in one place it would take only three men to care for them.

If the size of the barn and the Iranian ownership were not enough to stir interest there was the charge last month in Jack Anderson's syndicated column that Mansur Rafizadeh, the man who brought the Iranian group to this quiet dairying country, was the head of the United States operations of SAVAK, the Iranian secret police agency that was keeping an eye on Iranian students in this country among others.

The column described SAVAK as being "answerable only to the Shah of Iran" and "one of the most feared secret police agencies in the world."

Mr. Anderson made no mention of the Boonville barn but The Utica Press suggested the connection in a page one story with a banner headline saying: "Boonville Barn's Owner An Iranian Police Agent?"

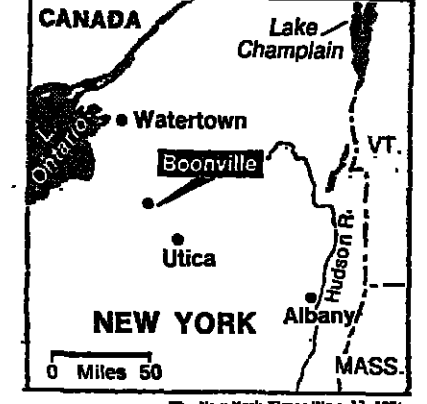

The story stirred even more speculation.

Only a U.N. Attaché

"There were rumors that we were going to build cells in the barn to lock up dissident Iranian students studying here," said Mr. Rafizadeh by telephone from his Franklin Lakes, N. J., home in a rare interview.

Mr. Rafizadeh denied strongly that he was the head of SAVAK's operations here and said he only was an attaché in the Iranian mission to the United Nations. He declined to describe his duties as attaché and, when asked if he knew who was head of SAVAK here, he replied: "I have no comment on that."

As for the barn Mr. Rafizadeh said that, while he did bring the group to Boonville and Mr. Tehrani is his brother-in-law, he had no financial interest in the project.

The New York Times/Nov. 12, 1976

Mr. Rafizadeh denied that the corporation was named after him because it bore his first name. He said Mansur was an old family name.

The concern by local business leaders about the speculation over the Iranian operation was summed up in an editorial by Livingston Lansing, the editor-publisher of the local weekly, The Boonville Herald and Adirondack Tourist.

Mr. Lansing's editorial said the charges about Mr. Rafizadeh were "nothing short of scandalous."

The editorial noted that Mr. Rafizadeh had denied the Anderson charge and "thus it is Mr. Rafizadeh's word against Mr. Anderson's and Mr. Anderson's sources have often in the past not been correct."

Mr. Lansing praised the Iranians for creating out of abandoned land "a farm that is rapidly becoming a showplace and should now become most productive agriculturally."

The editorial added: "We do not need any more hounding of these people by city reporters trying to build circulation for their papers."

Tenants Tilt With Windmill and Con Edison

By ROBERT McG. THOMAS

The day they decided to put a windmill on the roof of the building at 519 East 11th Street was the day Consolidated Edison shut off the electricity, causing the water-heating solar collectors to overheat.

"You should have seen the steam," Travis Price recalled yesterday afternoon as he stood on the roof of the five-story, tenant-owned, tenant-rehabilitated building, listening to the three-blade turbine whirl in the wind.

Just as soon as a few wires are connected, the 2,000-watt wind-driven generator will produce enough electricity to light the building's hallways and drive the pump for the energy system, which will provide 85 percent of the hot water used by the building's 11 tenants.

And that means that if Con Edison ever shuts off the electricity again (as it did during a brief payment dispute after the solar collectors were installed last winter), the pump will nevertheless keep on pumping, the water pipes under the solar collectors will not overheat and the tenants' hot water will not go up in steam.

The $4,000 windmill was paid for by a Federal grant and erected Thursday by the building's tenants and their 11th Street neighbors. It is the latest in a long line of innovations that have marked the rehabilitation of No. 519.

Seen as Rehabilitation Model

And like the others, including the solar collectors, the windmill is seen by Mr. Price and his associates on the project's Energy Task Force as a model for further rehabilitation under the project's primary innovation: sweat equity.

Sweat equity, in the parlance of the Adopt-a-Building project that is sponsoring the rehabilitation of No. 519 and a number of other buildings on the block, is the procedure under which tenants pay for the cooperative ownership of their apartments by donating labor to the rehabilitation.

And it is sweat equity, according to Mr. Price and the 11th Street project's Adopt-a-Building coordinator, Michael Freedberg, that will solve the city's underlying housing dilemma by providing "affordable housing" to low-income residents.

In the case of No. 519, whose rehabilitation is being financed by a $177,000 Federal loan (as well as a $43,000 Federal grant to provide extra insulation and the solar hot-water system), rents work out to an average of about $35 a room, according to Mr. Freedberg.

Zoning Threat Fails to Faze Proprietors of Sex Shops

By RONALD SMOTHERS

There was sex and self-confidence along Eighth Avenue yesterday.

The sex was commercial as usual, peddled in storefronts on film, in slick bindings or in the flesh. The self-confidence came from managers of some of the sex establishments, who reacted to the city's proposed new zoning regulations that, on their face, would all but put them out of business.

"I think it's all a waste of time," asserted a man who said he was the manager of the Show World Center, between 42d and 43d Streets. The place is a sex supermarket with peep shows on the street floor, books in the basement, live burlesque upstairs—but no private rooms for couples, the manager hastened to point out.

"They've been trying to get rid of prostitution and pornography for a long time, but they'll never do it," he said. "There are too many places like this and we don't have to go out and pull people inside."

That was the theme sounded over and over by managers or operators of the peep shows, bookstores, movie theaters and places advertising "girls, girls, girls." Their business was thriving, and many insisted that if they were closed down on Eighth Avenue they would just open up somewhere else.

The proposed regulations, said Wilbert A. Tatum, director of the city's Midtown Action, which helped draft them, are an attempt to "disperse" the sex outlets, "not outlaw them."

Among other things, they would prohibit pornographic operations within 500 feet of residential areas, limit to three the number of sex establishments within a 1,000-foot radius in commercial areas, and limit them to one sign advertising their service or product. The establishments banned by the proposed zoning plan would have a year from the date the regulations are enacted to close down.

Mr. Tatum said that the city felt its regulations, patterned after a Detroit ordinance upheld by the United States Supreme Court, would withstand. First Amendment challenges since they constituted the exercise of a legitimate city right through zoning to regulate the concentration of a particular kind of real estate use.

"The owner's got over a half a million invested here," said the manager of the Show World Center, which has been open for about a year. "If it wasn't lucrative I wouldn't—I mean the owner wouldn't—be in the business. Look at the bottom line."

None of My Business

Show World's nearest competitor, Psychedelic, is a seedy-looking establishment across the street and a walk up a narrow flight of stairs to live burlesque, films and private rooms for couples. Prostitutes solicit customers on the street and take them upstairs to a room that they rent from the owner of Psychedelic, and what happens in the room is "none of my business as long as no one gets robbed or hurt," the manager said.

While he generally condemned the proposed zoning regulations as "unfair," one aspect appeared to please him: Psychedelic

The drastically reduced prices on men's clothing regularly advertised by three men's clothing shops were actually fictitious, according to the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs, which announced that the shops had agreed to discontinue the advertisements. The shops—Merns of 75 Church Street, the Male Shop of Brooklyn, at Ralph Avenue and Avenue J, and National Brands of Manhattan, at Third Avenue and 86th Street, did not admit any wrongdoing, but agreed that in future advertisements the figure quoted as the "regular price" would be the one at which the merchandise was actually sold for a substantial period of time immediately preceding a sale.

Merns and National Brands paid the department $200 for investigative costs, while the Male Shop paid $400.

In the next moment, the manager of Psychedelic became philosophical and said he didn't know what all the fuss was about over the commercial lust outlets. A saturated market as well as competition had hurt the establishment, he said, "and the curiosity is gone."

"It's all dead or dying," he said of the pornography business. "It's like television. It's overplayed. Almost all we get now are the sickies."

Adieu to Ginnie Mae—For a While

By RICHARD PHALON

The Government National Mortgage Association, which has sold about $4.7 billion worth of mortgage participation securities to underwriters in the last 22 months, is scraping the bottom of its portfolio.

The auction Ginnie Mae is scheduled to run next Wednesday on $177 million in one-family mortgage participations may be its last such trip to market for some time to come.

The sale is a reflection of the high favor the participations have found with investors. A blend of safety and high yield—the securities are guaranteed by the Government and return a quarter point or more than Treasury issues of similar maturity—they have created such brisk demand that Ginnie Mae is sold out. That does not mean, however, that Ginnie Mae is gone forever.

Next Wednesday's auction, a spokesman for the agency said, "will be the last until we rebuild our portfolio." Since the banks are loaded with mortgage money, there will be far less need for Ginnie Mae—following its Congressional mandate—to step in and support the market as aggressively as it has for the last three years.

Wall Street is divided over the question as to the impact Ginnie Mae's phase-out will have on what has proved to be one of the most popular investment packages underwriters have helped to put together.

"I think it just means the difference between very rapid growth and just plain rapid growth [in outstanding certificates]," said Thomas Riordan, head of Merrill Lynch & Company's Ginnie Mae trading department.

"I think it's going to mean even more growth for us," said William W. Bartlett, a specialist in Ginnie Maes for the First Boston Corporation. "Mortgages that were finding their way into the Ginnie Mae portfolio are now going to be coming directly into the free market."

By any standard, the growth of the Ginnie Mae market has been remarkable. As recently as 19 months ago there was $16 billion worth of the participation certificates outstanding. The total has since swelled to about $30 billion.

According to Mr. Riordan, only about $5 billion worth of that $14 billion increase was generated by direct sales out of the Ginnie Mae portfolio. The balance came from packages put together by mortgage bankers and submitted to Ginnie Mae for its approval and guarantee.

The guarantee, of course, is one of the reasons why institutional investors—banks and pension funds—have shown such an insatiable appetite for the Ginnie Mae "pass through" securities.

The securities represent a pro rata share in a pool of mortgages on single-family homes insured by the Federal Housing Administration or the Veterans Administration.

About 40 or more Wall Street firms—including such well-known names as Merrill Lynch, First Boston, and Goldman Sachs—both underwrite and make secondary trading markets in the securities.

Individual interest in them has also been rising, but still amounts to only about 10 percent of the new issues market, according to Mr. Riordan.

The big attraction for individual and institutional investors alike is the blend of safety and yield.

The securities are a direct obligation of Ginnie Mae as to both interest and principal, payable monthly—a feature that many retired individuals find attractive.

Yields on Ginnie Maes tend to rise and fall with mortgage rates generally, but they are also deeply affected by the gravitational pull of other Government securities and top-rated corporation bonds.

At current levels, the Ginnie Maes are returning around 8 percent a year, not including a "kicker" of about 14/100 of a point that springs from the monthly (as distinguished from semiannual) interest payments.

Though the mortgages on which Ginnie Mae's are based carry a maturity of 30 years, the yield on the securities is figured on level payments made over a period of 12 years—the average span in which F.H.A. mortgages are paid off.

There were occasions last fall when Ginnie Maes returned as much as top-rated corporate bonds. At the moment they are yielding 25/100 to 60/100 of 1 percent higher than Treasury bonds of comparable maturity.

Delay in Distribution Of Tax Form Likely

The 1976 Tax Reform Act came out of Congress so late that it has delayed Internal Revenue Service printing schedules. The delay could have some effect on taxpayers who like to get their returns in early, generally people expecting a refund.

In past years the I.R.S. has put a perverse twist on the jollity of the season by getting the tax return forms in the mail just before Christmas—usually in the third or fourth weeks of December.

This year the short form tax returns will not be in the mail much before Jan. 7. The long forms are expected to begin arriving at taxpayers' homes between Jan. 3 and Jan. 11.

The distribution of the letter was the latest development in a series of charges and countercharges involving Mr. Gamble and his directors. Within the last few weeks, the growing feud has led to the resignation of several directors and their replacement by other officers.

On Thursday, Mr. Gamble issued a "personal statement" in which he said that a recent attempt to unseat him as company head was "supported by false assertions that I have undertaken improper transactions without having fully

The stock of Cabot, a producer of carbon black, rose 1 1/4 to 34 1/2 and finished within a fraction of its yearly high. The company raised its dividend and reported nine-month earnings of $29.37 million, in contrast to a year-earlier loss of $7.25 million.

Steel stocks the prototype "Smokestack America" sector that ran up in price between late 1974 and early 1976, continued to slip. Officials of U.S. Steel said the nation's largest steelmaker expected the present lull in shipments to continue for the rest of this year.

Meanwhile, U.S. Steel lowered its estimates for industrywide shipments for 1976 to between 90 million and 91 million tons from an earlier projection of 95 million to 97 million tons. The company said it expected industry shipments to climb 10 percent in 1977 to an estimated 100 million tons.

U.S. Steel shares dipped 3/4 to 46 1/2 yesterday, while Bethlehem Steel dropped 3/4 to 35.

Some glamour stocks with high price-earnings ratios—a factor that causes caution on the part of many investors—took a drubbing. Digital Equipment, a leading producer of minicomputers, fell 1 1/4 to 48 1/4.

Turnover on the New York Stock Exchange rose to 15.55 million shares from 13.23 million shares on Thursday, when banks and some offices were closed in observance of Veterans Day.

Combined trading in all issues listed on the Big Board advanced to 18.5 million shares from 15.4 million shares.

On the American Stock Exchange the market value index dipped 0.04 to 99.83 as trading volume eased to 1.59 million shares from 1.67 million shares.

Over-the-counter issues generally showed small declines. The NASDAQ industrial index eased 0.06 to 89.94, while the composite index dipped 0.05 to 88.10.

In options trading on the Amex, a total of 30,353 contracts changed hands, down from Thursday's 34,286 contracts. On the Chicago Board Options Exchange, volume totaled 56,868 contracts, down 65,878.

Gold Price Up Abroad; Dollar Also Moves Ahead Except Against Pound

LONDON, Nov. 12 (AP)—The price of gold rose today in both London and Zurich, Europe's major bullion centers. The dollar made fractional gains against most European currencies but lost a bit against the British pound and Italian lira.

Trading was quiet on most foreign exchanges, and currencies showed little movement.

Gold rose by $1.75 an ounce in London to close at $135.75. The gain in Zurich was $1.50, and the metal closed at $134.00 an ounce in both centers yesterday.

In Frankfurt, the dollar closed at 2.4135 West German marks, a tiny gain on yesterday's close of 2.4130 marks. In Paris, the dollar closed at 4.9823 French francs, up from 4.9822 Wednesday. Paris markets were closed yesterday for Armistice Day.

In Zurich, the dollar closed at 2.4401 Swiss francs, up from 2.4396 francs, and in Amsterdam the dollar finished the day's trading at 2.5265 Dutch guilders, up from 2.5255 guilders.

The pound made its modest gain against the dollar with significant support for the second day by the Bank of England, dealers said. The pound closed at $1.626.

Financial Follies Boards S.S. Cotton Picker

The annual Financial Follies, a parody of the year's activities in the worlds of business, finance and government, was presented last night in the form of an updated minstrel show aboard a mythical showboat, the S.S. Cotton Picker.

To show the banks the profit-making trail To be so right so often doesn't tax me, but I need a little luck Yes, I need a little luck If I'm gonna keep you out of jail.

The show's high point was the appearance of President Ford, who had not realized that he had lost the election, and Mr. Carter, who described his financial program as many in the audience perceived it to be—'Soak the rich, spend more money, print more money, spend more money.'

Grain Futures Weaken; Traders See Possibility Of Big Crop Carryover

CHICAGO, Nov. 12 (AP)—Corn and oats futures declined more than 3 cents a bushel on the Chicago Board of Trade today in selling influenced by a possibility of increased stocks and smaller usage of feed grains into next year.

The Agriculture Department noted in its supply-and-demand report that exports of major grains would increase but that this year's huge production of wheat and feed grains would mean higher stocks and carryovers into the next growing season.

17 Guilty of Conspiracy in $200 Million Narcotics Ring

By ARNOLD H. LUBASCH

A jury convicted 17 defendants and acquitted four others of conspiracy charges yesterday at the end of a three-month trial involving a major ring accused of importing and selling hundreds of millions of dollars worth of narcotics.

The jury of seven men and five women deliberated for six days before returning the verdict in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Judge Richard Owen set Jan. 10 for sentencing of the defendants, who face prison terms of up to 40 years.

The prosecutors—Daniel J. Bell, Constance Cushman and Thomas H. Sear—said the defendants had been found guilty of conspiracy in the distribution of more than 150 pounds of cocaine a year from 1968 to 1974 and of more than 26 pounds of heroin a year from 1970 to 1973.

Law enforcement authorities said it was difficult to determine the value of the narcotics, but the total street value cited in the indictment was estimated at more than $200 million.

One of the main defendants, Juan Antonio Alvarez, an alleged leader of the narcotics ring, was convicted in absentia. He jumped bail of $500,000 shortly before the trial began.

Defendant Jumped Bail

Other major defendants who were convicted include Frank Moten of Englewood, N.J.; Angel Rodriguez of Miami, and William Hightower of Washington. Two women, Yvonne Schenault of Chicago and Lois Sampson of Washington, were also convicted, along with Mrs. Sampson's husband, Joseph.

The jury failed to reach a verdict on one defendant, Bernard Brightman. Three additional defendants pleaded guilty before the trial. The indictment last April described the defendants as members of a "chain of distribution" that sold narcotics in New York, Chicago, Washington, Miami and other cities.

In a separate narcotics case, Robert Stone of 1725 York Avenue in Manhattan received a 10-year prison sentence from Judge J. Wyatt in Federal District Court in Manhattan. The prosecutor, Robert J. Costello, said in a sentencing memorandum that the Drug Enforcement Administration believed that Mr. Stone was "one of the nation's premier black sources of supply of cocaine" in New York and several other cities throughout the country.

Another narcotics defendant, Virgil Alessi, pleaded guilty yesterday to charges of possessing about a half pound of heroin and of evading $9,000 in income taxes. He had been identified as a key associate of Vincent Papa, who is serving a 20-year sentence as a major heroin dealer.

Mobile in Uproar Over U.S. Judge Who Told It to Revise Government

Federal courts have ordered state prisons to be brought up to standards set by the courts, in most cases involving large expenditures of state funds.

In New York City, a Federal court ordered the aging Tombs Prison closed and a new facility built.

In New Jersey, a state court in effect ordered the Legislature to enact an income tax by declaring the closing of public schools until adequate financial support was made available—possible only through enactment of the income tax.

In Chicago, a Federal court ordered affirmative action in the hiring of policemen, a step that has also been taken in numerous other places.

In Boston, parts of the operation of public schools have been directed by Federal Judge Arthur Garrity in an effort to correct racial imbalances.

In a speech to the new Constitutional Crisis Committee, Mr. Mims, the current Mayor under a rotation system among the commissioners, said: "This decision, if not reversed, could be the beginning of the end for local government and the open door for complete Federal takeover of community affairs."

The city has set aside $500,000, including $200,000 in Federal revenue-sharing money, to fight the decision.

Eugene McKenzie, a furniture store owner who is head of the crisis committee, said in an interview that the petitions for impeachment of Judge Pittman were based on "usurpation of the voters' right to choose their form of local government as guaranteed by the Alabama Constitution."

The petition also maintains that the 10th Amendment of the United States Constitution delegating certain powers to the Federal Government and reserving others to the states had been breached by the ruling.

Mayor Mims said in an interview that the issue was not racial. "If we'd been bad to blacks, been mean old honkies, then maybe we'd deserve this," he said. "I just hope that blacks will realize that the issue is if a judge can order this, he can order Ku Klux Klansmen into city government."

In his ruling, Judge Pittman observed that "there is no formal prohibition against blacks seeking office in Mobile" and that "since the Voting Rights Act of 1965, blacks register and vote without hindrance."

However, the judge found that "one indication that local political processes are not equally open is the fact that no black person has ever been elected to the at-large city commission."

Although the judge found no current examples of "overt gross discrimination" in city services, he said in his ruling that there were "significant differences and the sluggishness" in responding to needs in black areas as compared to white areas.

Moreover, he found significant racial imbalances in city administrative agencies appointed by the city commissioners.

Mayor Mims said that while such imbalances appear to exist, blacks did have minority representation on all such boards and that appointments were made according to qualifications and not according to race.

Judge Pittman's ruling is being appealed to the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in New Orleans. No hearing date has been set, and no ruling is expected before the date of the municipal elections next August. The city will ask for a stay of the order, if necessary, to continue to elect the commissioners as its form of Government. The Mayor also said that the city would continue its appeals to the United States Supreme Court if necessary.

Richmond Election Ban Lifted
RICHMOND, Nov. 13 (AP)—A Federal district judge today lifted a ban against city elections that had been imposed by the United States Supreme Court after lawsuits alleged that a property annexation had diluted the votes of Richmond's black citizens.

Judge Robert Merhige Jr. set March 1 for the first councilman elections in six and a half years.

The Jan. 1, 1970, annexation of 23 square miles of overwhelmingly white Chesterfield County was approved by the Federal District Court in Washington, with the city agreeing to a ward system for electing its nine-member council, all of whose members had previously been elected at-large.

Judge Merhige was a member of a three-judge Federal panel convened almost five years ago to consider suits challenging the annexation.

After the Supreme Court ruling the three-judge court issued an injunction on Oct. 8, 1974, banning city elections.

The Supreme Court lifted its voting ban Nov. 1, but the three-judge court's injunction remained in effect until Judge Merhige dissolved it today.

The new Richmond City Council is to take office March 8.

First Global Concerts for Casals Prove a Success in Mexico City

By ALAN RIDING
Special to The New York Times

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 12—The First International Casals Concerts wound up here last night with an all-Beethoven program that gave a rousing finish to a four-week festival that musicians, critics and audiences all agreed was a great success.

In a country with little tradition of classical music and few first-class orchestras, the festival, with its galaxy of virtuoso conductors and soloists, stirred enormous excitement and attracted huge audiences, both in concert halls and on radio and television.

The organizers of the concerts, known in Spanish as the Primeras Jornadas Internacionales Casals to avoid confusion with the annual Casals Festival in Puerto Rico, are now confident that this will become an annual event, particularly since Mrs. Carmen Lopez Portillo, the wife of Mexico's incoming president, is an accomplished pianist and a keen patron of the arts.

The festival, the cost of which is a well-kept secret, was sponsored by an ad hoc committee including many government officials and financed by private donations and government contributions.

Because of the evident high cost of bringing hundreds of musicians to Mexico, however, some Mexican critics have suggested that the money would have been better spent trying to improve the quality of the country's conservatories of music and orchestras rather than creating a spectacular, though passing, attraction.

Nevertheless, efforts were made to prevent the festival from becoming an elitist event, first by carrying live radio and television broadcasts of all concerts, then by organizing special concerts at "popular" prices in huge auditoriums and, finally, by adding extra concerts outside Mexico City to the program.

A new orchestra, the Pablo Casals orchestra of Mexico, was formed for the festival and, after being conducted by Zubin Mehta, Eduardo Mata, Sergiu Comissiona and Alexander Schneider, it gave concerts in Guanajuato, San Miguel de Allende and Puebla.

Players Called Cooperative
Commenting on the quality of the orchestra, which is 75 percent Mexican and 25 percent foreigners, Mr. Mehta said that "one cannot demand the same from an orchestra that has recently been formed as one that is well established, but these are good players, friendly and cooperative, and I felt well conducting them."

The London Symphony Orchestra arrived for the second part of the festival and, in addition to the full orchestra, which played with the violinist Pinchas Zukerman, the pianist Eugene Istomin and the cellist Leonard Rose, its wind ensemble and chamber section gave separate concerts.

The final concert of the festival again brought the full orchestra together with Mr. Istomin, who played Beethoven's Fifth Piano Concerto.

Mr. Mata, a Mexican who will shortly take up residence as the permanent conductor of the Dallas Symphony Orchestra and was musical director of the festival, conducted the final concert, which also included Beethoven's Prometheus Overture and Seventh Symphony.
